'Aus Italien' was played, under the conductorship of Herr Oscar Fried, at the seventh concert of the Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde.—Hausegger's interesting 'Barbarossa' Symphony was revived at an orchestral concert given by Herr Oscar Noë (who has since met his death by gas poisoning).—Four cantatas by J. S. Bach, 'Herr, gehe nicht ins Gericht,' 'Sie werden, aus Saba alle kommen,' 'Es erhub sich ein Streit' and 'Jesu der du meine Seele,' were rendered to perfection at the third concert of the Philharmonischer Chor (conductor, Professor Siegfried Ochs).—On March 24, Bach's 'Johannespassion' was performed by the Singakademie under Professor Georg Schumann's baton. The same choir sang the 'Matthäuspassion' on Good Friday. An oratorio for soli, chorus and orchestra, entitled 'Res ultimae quatuor,' by the Polish pater Plewa Plewczynski, was performed in the Philharmonie, under the conductorship of the composer.—Brahms's 'Schicksalslied' and the ninth Symphony formed the programme of the eighth and last concert of the Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde (conductor, Herr Oscar Fried).—Herr Dirk Schäfer, a pianist and composer from Amsterdam, gave a concert at the Choralion Saal, and won a great success with his two Sonatas for pianoforte and violin and one for pianoforte and violoncello.—An interesting Pianoforte sonata in B flat minor, by Siegfried Karg-Elert (Op. 80), figured in the programme of Herr Maykapar's recital. The Komische Oper recently performed Eduard Künneke's opera 'Robin Endé' with considerable success.

BRESLAU.

At the ninth concert of the Orchesterverein (conductor, Dr. Dohrn) Brahms's Concerto for violin, violoncello and orchestra (soloists, Messrs. Marteau and Hugo Becker), and Richard Strauss's 'Don Quixote' were performed. Cherubini's overture to 'Les Abencerages' preceded the Brahms Concerto (as it did when this work was given for the first time in Breslau twenty-one years ago, Brahms having expressed a wish for 'a pleasant introduction' ('eine behagliche Vorbereitung').

BRUSSELS.

On March 21, a special performance for the benefit of the sufferers by the floods in Paris was given at the Théâtre Royale de la Monnaie. Daudet's 'L'Arlesienne,' with Bizet's music, and Rameau's ballet 'Les Fêtes d'Hébé' (presented in strict accordance with the directions for the first production of the work at the Château de Versailles, 1764) formed the programme. At the same institution Wagner's 'Flying Dutchman,' with Herr van Rooy in the title-part, was revived after an interval of twenty years.—Bach's 'Easter oratorio' and the cantata 'Du Hirte Israels' were performed at the third concert of the Société J. S. Bach.

BUDA PESTH.

Richard Strauss's opera 'Elektra' was accorded an enthusiastic reception on the occasion of its production at the Royal Opera.

CHEMNITZ.

At the twentieth concert in the Lucaskirche, Max Reger's 'rooth Psalm' (conducted by the composer) and 'Das tausendjährige Reich,' by Albert Fuchs, were performed for the first time.

COLOGNE.

Charpentier's 'Louise' has been successfully revived at the Opera House.—Robert Kahn's 'Stürmlied' for chorus, orchestra and organ was produced at the tenth Gürzenich Concert. It was excellently performed under the direction of Herr Fritz Steinbach, and very favourably received. At the same concert Dr. Hans Huber's 'Heroic' Symphony created considerable interest. The eleventh concert was devoted to works by Brahms, including the 'German Requiem' and the third Symphony in F major.

COPENHAGEN.

The third concert of the Musikforeningen, on April 11, consisted solely of works by Schumann (to commemorate the coming centenary). The programme included the overture to 'Genoveva,' the Pianoforte concerto (soloist, Miss Johanne Stockmarr), and the scenes from Goethe's 'Faust.' Dvorák's 'Stabat Mater' was excellently performed under the baton of Herr Frederik Rung at the Cæciliaforeningen's third concert on April 18.

DESSAU.

On March 27 the opera 'Der König von Samarkand,' text (after Grillparzer) and music by Franz Mikorey, was successfully produced at the Court Theatre under the composer's direction.

DORTMUND.

At the fifth concert of the Philharmonic Orchestra, Friedrich Gernsheim's latest work, an orchestral tone-poem 'Zu einem Drama' was produced with success under the composer's conductorship.

DRESDEN.

Bernhard Sekles's orchestral fantasy 'Aus den Gärten der Semiramis' was produced at the fifth concert of the Königliche Kapelle.

DÜSSELDORF.

The beautiful opera 'Der Widerspenstigen Zähmung' ('The Taming of the Shrew'), by the late Hermann Götz, has been performed for the first time at the Municipal Theatre. At the same theatre the production of Richard Strauss's 'Elektra' has caused great interest.

ESSEN.

A three-act comic opera entitled 'Die Heiterethei,' by Wilhelm Reich, has recently been produced at the Municipal Theatre. The work was accorded a very favourable reception.

FRANKFORT.

Richard Strauss's early opera 'Guntram' was recently given for the first time here. The work proved very interesting, particularly in comparison with the composer's later dramatic works.

GÖRLITZ.

Theodore Dubois's 'Symphonie française' has been produced here, under the direction of Herr Oscar Jüttner, with success.

GUBEN.

On Palm Sunday an oratorio, 'Jairus,' by Kgl. Musikdirektor Fr. Zierau, was produced under the composer's direction with much success.

HALLE.

An interesting programme, which included Gernsheim's 'Wächterlied,' Bruckner's 'Germanenzug,' Rheinberger's 'Johannesnacht' and 'Es liegt so abends still der See,' by Hermann Goetz, was submitted at the second concert of the Lehrergesangverein.

HAMBURG.

At the last Philharmonic concert, Bruckner's ninth Symphony was given, under the direction of Herr Karl Panzner. The programme also included Reinecke's 'Manfred' overture.

HANOVER.

Carl Weis's opera 'Der polnische Jude' was performed recently for the first time at the Royal Theatre. The combined choirs of the Hannoverscher Musikakademie and the Hannoversche Männergesangverein gave, with the aid of the Royal Orchestra, an excellent performance of Berlioz's 'Faust.'

LEIPSIK.

At the twentieth Gewandhaus Concert which, owing to the absence of Herr Nikisch, was conducted by Dr. Karl Muck, from Berlin, Bruckner's E major Symphony was excellently played. The twenty-first concert was entirely devoted to compositions by Schumann. The programme included his C major Symphony, the 'Genoveva' overture, the Pianoforte concerto (soloist, Herr Max Pauer), and some of his most beautiful songs. Following the usual custom, the season of the Gewandhaus concerts was brought to a close with an excellent performance of Beethoven's ninth Symphony. Herr Nikisch commenced the concert with an impressive rendering of the late Professor Reinecke's orchestral prologue 'In memoriam' (written originally in memory of Ferdinand David).—Schumann's beautiful choral work 'Das Paradies und die Peri' was performed at the last concert of the Leipziger Singakademie (conductor, Herr Wohlgemuth).—The eleventh Philharmonic concert took the form of a memorial concert for the late Professor Reinecke. Among the works played were his Prelude to the fifth act of 'Manfred' and his Pianoforte concerto in C major.—The pianist Joseph Wieniawsky, brother of the great violinist Henry Wieniawsky, gave a recital of his own compositions in the Kaufhaus, and proved himself still, in spite of his seventy-three years, a pianist of considerable executive powers.

LIÈGE.

The second concert of the Conservatoire was devoted to compositions by César Franck. Among the works selected were his 'Psyche' (symphonic-poem for chorus and orchestra), and the 3rd, 4th and 8th numbers from his oratorio 'Les Béatitudes.'

LYONS.

Henry Fevrier's opera 'Monna Vanna' has been successfully produced at the Opera House; the composer, who conducted, was accorded a very enthusiastic reception.—The interesting symphonic-poem 'L'effet de nuit,' by Sylvio Lazzari, was played at the eighth symphony concert of the Société des Grand Concerts.

MANNHEIM.

At the Court Theatre, the opera 'Vasantasena,' by Leopold Reichwein, was recently revived under the direction of the composer.

MONTE CARLO.

Boito's opera 'Mefistofele,' with Chaliapin in the title-part, has lately been given at the opera house with great success. Other interesting revivals have been Saint-Saëns's 'Proserpine' and Massenet's 'Thérèse.'

MOSCOW.

Richard Strauss's 'Symphonia domestica' was recently introduced here with much success by Herr Oscar Fried.

MUNICH.

On March 20, Liszt's very rarely heard oratorio 'Christus' was most excellently performed at the Musikalische Akademie under the baton of Herr Felix Mottl. The work, which contains many beauties, made a great impression.

PARIS.

At the Opéra Comique the late Samuel Rousseau's four-act opera 'Léone' (to the libretto of George Montorgueil) has been recently produced. The work contains many musical beauties, but seems to be hampered by the somewhat undramatic text.—Gabriel Dupont's 'Hymne à Aphrodite' and Pienré's 'L'An Mil' were performed at the Colonne concert on March 20.—The beautiful 'Requiem' by Gabriel Fauré was heard at the Conservatoire concert on March 27. On Good Friday, César Franck's chef-d'œuvre 'Les Béatitudes' was given at the Colonne concerts.—On the same day Rimsky-Korsakoff's 'La Grande Pâque russe' was performed for the first time in Paris at the Lamoureux concerts.

PRAGUE.

On March 17 a new opera, entitled 'Fratres Carolus,' music and libretto by Ludwig Rochlitzer, was successfully produced at the Neues Deutsches Theater.

STRASSBURG.

The three-act opera 'Der Florentiner,' by Georg Raubenegger, was recently produced at the Municipal Theatre, but was not successful.

TOULOUSE.

At the fifth Conservatoire Concert the symphonic poem 'Chant de la Destinée,' by Gabriel Dupont, was played for the first time.

ZÜRICH.

Pierre Maurice's opera 'Misé Brun' has been successfully performed for the first time at the Municipal Theatre. The composer was present.

An enjoyable concert was given on April 16 at the Caxton Hall, Westminster, by Barclay's Musical Society, under the experienced and safe direction of Mr. J. W. Lewis. The organization is a male-voice choir of about fifty select voices. Its aims are high, and all the music performed is well rehearsed. The quality of the voices is exceedingly good; they have sonority and agreeable blendfulness, but perhaps their appeal is even greater on the ground of the high training and finish they owe to their conductor. The choral programme on this occasion included 'Hymn to Apollo' (Gounod), the 'Pilgrims' chorus' (Wagner), 'When shadows flee' (Scharwenka), 'To the sons of art' (Mendelssohn), 'The long day closes' (Sullivan), 'O peaceful night' (German), and 'Thor's war song' (Mauder). A first-rate small professional band played the accompaniments admirably. Miss Florence Holderness and Mr. Harry Dearth sang songs, and Miss Muriel Herbert (pianoforte), Miss Jeanne Chevreau (harp) and Mr. J. E. Hambleton (violinocello) contributed solos. Mr. W. A. Searle was the accompanist.

The annual general meeting of the British Musicians' Pension Society was held at the Salle Erard on April 5, Mr. J. E. Hambleton presiding. Founded so recently as January, 1909, this young movement has already secured a membership of over 150 professional musicians, and should have a useful future. The scheme has been worked out by practical musicians for the assistance of their comrades of either sex in old age or during previous disablement, and is so modest in its subscriptions that the very poorest in the profession can avail themselves of its benefits. The income for 1909, including contributions of £106 and donations of £18 8s. 6d., amounted to over £126, the expenses, including those of foundation of the Society, being about £26, leaving a balance at the bank of nearly £100 at the end of the year. Thirty new members have since been admitted, and the balance in hand increased to £189. All inquiries as to the Society's objects and purposes should be addressed to the honorary secretary, Mr. L. W. Pinches, 21, Albert Embankment, London, S.E.

Mr. Coleridge-Taylor gave an interesting recital of his recent compositions in the Public Hall, Croydon, on April 6. These included Ballade in C minor for violin and pianoforte; soli for pianoforte, 'Feuille de Myrte,' 'Scène de Ballet' and 'Valse Orientale'; soli for violin, 'Three dances' and two 'Gipsy movements' (song and dance); and the following songs: A lament, A birthday, A lovely little dream, Unmindful of the roses, Sons of the sea, Five fairy ballads, She rested by the broken brook, Five-and-twenty sailormen. These were performed by Miss Effie Martyn, Mr. Julien Henry, vocalists; Miss Myrtle Peggy (pianoforte); and Mr. Willie J. Read violin. Needless to say the recital was listened to with great interest and pleasure by the audience.

At the Royal Academy of Music the following prizes have recently been awarded: the Charles Mortimer prize (for composition) to Nellie Fulcher, of Whitchurch, Salop; the Battison Haynes prize (for composition) to Adela Hamaton, of Uxbridge; the Goldberg prize (basses) to William J. Samuëll, of Swansea, Harry Milner being commended; the Sterndale Bennett prize (pianoforte) to Evelyn Dawkin, of London, Adela Hamaton and Elsie Jones being commended; the Louisa Hopkins memorial prize (for pianoforte) to Evelyn Dawkin, of London, Adela Hamaton being highly commended.

The Graystoke Glee Club gave a concert in the theatre of the Birkbeck College on April 9, when the programme included the following part-music: 'Violets' (Cowen), 'The skylark' (King Hall), 'Sinks the night' (Schumann), 'The Spanish gipsy girl' (Lassen), 'Sound sleep' (Vaughan Williams), 'From the green heart of the waters' (Coleridge-Taylor), and the Spinning chorus from the 'Flying Dutchman.' The soloists were Miss Myra Hess (pianoforte), Mr. H. Wynn Reeves (violin) and Mr. Harry Child (vocalist).

In connection with the Welsh Church of St. David, Paddington, an Eisteddfod was held on Easter Monday, when the competitors were mostly drawn from the Welsh churches and chapels in the metropolis. Mr. T. Westlake-Morgan (Mwyndaf Bencerd) was the musical adjudicator.

A book entitled 'Stories of the Operas and the Singers' will shortly be published by Messrs. John Long, Ltd., in connection with the present Grand Opera season at Covent Garden. It will contain a synopsis of each of the operas to be produced, and biographical sketches with portraits of all the famous artists engaged both before and behind the curtain. The letterpress is by Mr. H. Saxe Wyndham.

Gounod's 'Redemption' will be performed on the Continent as follows: Brussels, July, 1910, at Institut Saint Louis, conductor, E. Wambach; Renaix (Belgium), October, 1910, at Chorale St. Martin, conductor, L'Abbé Fédor Stevens.

The violinist Herr Willy Hess has been appointed professor at the Königliche Hochschule für Musik, in Berlin, in succession to the late Professor Karl Halir.

Mr. T. Vincent Davies gave his annual concert at the Queen's Hall on April 14 to an appreciative audience.

Country News.

BRIEFLY SUMMARIZED.

We cannot hold ourselves responsible for the opinions expressed in this summary, as the notices are either prepared from local newspapers or furnished by correspondents.

Correspondents are particularly requested to enclose a programme when forwarding reports of concerts.

ABERDEEN.—A performance of Mozart's 'Requiem Mass' was given by the Choral Union at the Music Hall, under Mr. Arthur Collingwood. The recent resolve made by this Society to give only choral concerts, will, it is to be hoped, receive better justification in the future than was afforded at this concert. The choir achieved, however, an undoubted artistic success. The soloists were Miss Mabel Manson, Miss Lucy Nuttall, Mr. Cynlais Gibbs and Mr. Robert Radford. The second part of the programme consisted of selections from the 'Messiah.'

ASHTON-UNDER-LYNE.—The last of the Albert Fairbairn Subscription Concerts this season took place in the Town Hall on April 12, when Elgar's 'King Olaf' was the main feature of the programme. The solo parts were interpreted by Madame Lucie Gillespie, Mr. Charles Saunders and Mr. Charles Knowles—an excellent trio of vocalists. The choir was well balanced, displaying good quality of tone, and was ably supported by the orchestra (led by Mr. H. Whitfield), the latter being also heard to advantage in Weber's 'Oberon' overture. Mr. Fairbairn conducted, and deserves credit for the excellence of the performance.

BOURNEMOUTH.—At the Symphony concert on March 24, a Concert-overture by F. King-Hall, principal violin of the Municipal Orchestra, received its first performance. The work is in the key of E flat and is scored for a large orchestra. The themes, though not of a very taking character, are well-contrasted and are skillfully developed. The work has undoubtedly a definite programme, and the music would explain itself more readily if some hint were given as to the nature of that programme. The composer directed the performance—which was quite an exemplary one—and received an enthusiastic reception from the audience and orchestra alike. The Symphony was the 'Eroica' of Beethoven.—The Poole and Parkstone Philharmonic Society gave their annual concert on April 6, at St. Peter's School, Parkstone, when an interesting programme comprising Coleridge-Taylor's 'Hiawatha's Wedding-feast' and Bridge's choral ballad 'The flag of England' was presented. Owing to the sudden and regrettable illness of Mr. A. W. Ruse, the regular conductor of the Society, Dr. H. Holloway conducted, and carried out his duties very judiciously. This eleventh-hour change naturally had its effect on the choir, some indecision in the singing being apparent, but praise is due for the spirit and robustness displayed—a little more restraint would, indeed, have been welcome. The orchestra played efficiently under the careful leadership of Signor Bertoncini. The soloists were Miss Madeleine Applegate, Mr. Gerald Lee and Mr. Hamilton Law.

BRAMPTON.—The Choral Society gave a concert in St. Martin's Hall on March 31, when the chief features of the programme were Mendelssohn's 'Hymn of Praise' and Jensen's 'Feast of Adonis.' The choir sang with much credit to themselves and their conductor, Mr. Drakeford. The principal solo parts were sustained by Miss Gertrude Jacobson (joined by Miss Hilda Bell in the duet 'I waited for the Lord') and Mr. William Brown.

BRIGHTON.—Sullivan's 'Golden Legend' was performed with much success at the Dome on April 3, by the Festival Choir and Municipal Orchestra under the conductorship of Mr. Joseph Sinton. The solo vocalists were Madame Edith Welling, Madame Ethel Harman, Mr. Hubert Eisdell and Mr. Robin Overleigh. The concert concluded with the Overture and March from 'Tannhäuser.'

CARDIFF.—Sterndale Bennett's 'Woman of Samaria' was successfully given at the Clare Gardens Wesleyan Church on March 23, by the choir, augmented to about eighty voices. The accompaniments were played by Mr. Arthur Angle's orchestra of fourteen instrumentalists. The principal vocalists were Miss Florrie Jones, Mrs. David Evans, Mr. W. E. Carston and Mr. Stanley Barrett. Master Edgar Lewis was at the organ, and Mr. T. Diamond, the organist of the church, conducted.—The Minny Street Choir performed Sir Michael Costa's oratorio 'Eli,' with full orchestral accompaniment, at the Park Hall on April 6. The solo vocalists were Miss Rachel James, Madame C. Hambly-Spry, Mr. John Roberts, Mr. Lewys James and Mr. Talbot Thomas. The performance was throughout of a very high order, a noticeable feature being the perfect intonation of the choir. Mr. Arthur Angle led the orchestra, and Mr. Owen Williams conducted.—The Musical Society concluded their season on April 13 at the Park Hall with a performance of 'Israel in Egypt.' The singing of the choir, notably in the double choruses, was very striking. The solo vocalists were Miss Ada Forrest, Miss Lottie Wakelin and Mr. Cynlais Gibbs. There was an efficient orchestra, with Mr. Herbert Wyman at the organ. Mr. T. E. Aylward conducted with his customary skill and care.

CASTLE CARY.—The Choral Society under the direction of Mr. D. J. Gass, gave a good performance of Mendelssohn's 'Hymn of Praise' on April 7. The solo vocalists were Miss Madeleine W. Applegate, Mrs. E. G. Drewett, Mr. H. L. Wesley and Mr. R. T. A. Hughes. In the second part, violin and violoncello solos were given by Miss Russell Baily and Mr. Algernon Salter. Miss Beatrice Heginbotham's orchestra assisted.

CEFNMAWR.—A performance of 'Judas Maccabeus' was given on April 6 by the Tabernacle Choral Society, assisted by the Wrexham Orchestral Society, leader Mr. W. S. Stephenson. The rendering of the choruses gave ample proof of very careful rehearsal, and reflected great credit upon the conductor, Mr. Gethin Davies. The solo parts were sustained by Madame Bertha Rossow, Miss Maude Lloyd-Jones, Mr. David E. Ellis and Mr. Emyln Davies. Mr. Newton Wright gave valuable help at the organ.

CHELTENHAM.—The Musical Festival Society, conducted by Mr. J. A. Matthews, gave a concert in Bennington Hall on April 14, when the programme consisted of compositions by two sons of the conductor—John Sebastian and Harry Alexander. The church cantata 'The Conversion,' by the last-named, was given for the first time on this occasion, while the Easter Carol-anthem 'On wings of living light,' by John Sebastian, was also performed. These and other works by the same composers were warmly received by the audience. The solo parts were sung by Miss Edwards, Mr. F. W. Bushell and Mr. G. J. Matthews, and a pianoforte solo, 'A Frolic,' was well played by Miss Mary Hedger. The proceeds of the concert were devoted to the Organists' Benevolent League.

CHIPPENHAM.—The amateur orchestra of fifty performers gave their annual concert on April 7, when the programme included Mendelssohn's 'Ruy Blas' overture and ballet suite 'Sylvia' (Délibes). The vocalists were Miss Essex Finch and Mr. Dennis Drew. Mr. W. R. Pullein conducted.

CRANBROOK.—The boys of Cranbrook School gave an excellent performance of Bridge's 'Flag of England' at their School concert on April 7. The chorus work was distinctly good, and gave evidence of careful and thorough training, while the spirit of words and music was entered into with evident enjoyment by the boys. The soprano solo was sung by Mrs. D. W. W. Carmichael, and the accompaniments were played by the local Orchestral Society. Mr. H. J. Seaford, music-master at the School, conducted.

CRUYDON.—Miss Gilderooy Scott, a talented local contralto vocalist, gave an excellent recital at the small public hall on April 7. She was assisted by Mr. George Uttley, Mr. W. H. Reed (violin), Mr. Gilderooy Scott (violinello) and Miss Ethel Attwood (pianoforte). A prominent feature of the programme was the performance (probably for the first time in Craydon) of Bemberg's dramatic scene 'La Ballade du Désespéré,' in which the characters of Angel and Oet were ably sustained by the concert-giver and Mr. J. A. O'Brien. Other noteworthy numbers were Fauré's Violin sonata, capitolly interpreted by Miss Attwood and Mr. Reed, and Liza Lehmann's 'Four cautionary tales and a moral,' the engaging humour of which received ample justice at the hands of Miss Gilderooy Scott and Mr. Uttley, and gave great amusement to the audience.—A concert was given by the string orchestra associated with the Craydon Conservatoire of Music, in the large public hall on April 8, under the able conductorship of Mr. W. H. Reed. The orchestra displayed the excellent results of their training in Goetz's Serenade in D minor (Op. 22), Handel's Concerto for strings in D minor, Mendelssohn's Canzonetta for strings (Op. 12), and Gade's Novelletten in F (Op. 53). Miss Hilda Down (violin), Miss Cecilia Piers (vocalist) and Mr. Edward J. Shakespeare (pianoforte) gave proof of the excellent teaching at the institution in their respective solos. Mr. Arthur Manclark acted as accompanist.

DUFFTOWN.—The Choral Union's annual concert took place on April 1, when Coleridge-Taylor's 'Hiawatha' Trilogy was performed. Under the conductorship of Mr. John N. Taylor, the choir sang with much spirit and intelligence, and able support was given by the string orchestra led by Mr. James Riach. Mrs. G. S. Spencer assisted at the pianoforte, and Mr. Jupp was at the organ. The solo parts were sung by Miss Burt, Mr. Hamilton, and Mr. Cooper.

DUNDEE.—The Newport Choral Society gave a performance of Handel's 'Samson' in the Blyth Hall on March 23. The chorus-singing displayed intelligence and power, and the solo vocalists were Madame Norman Snowball, Miss Jenny Atkinson, Mr. Alexander Webster and Mr. Lewys James. Mr. Robert Scott was the conductor.

EALING.—For the past eight years Mr. Ben Johnson has organized and directed a series of Saturday Popular Concerts within the Borough of Ealing, and at the last concert of the season, on April 5, the Mayor of the Borough (Councillor E. C. Sayers, J.P.) proposed on behalf of the town that a very hearty vote of thanks be accorded Mr. Ben Johnson for his great services to the town in providing these excellent municipal concerts on Saturday evenings. At the same time the Mayor handed to Mr. Johnson a demi-hunter English gold lever watch, which had been subscribed to by many friends in the Borough, as a slight recognition of the work he had done in this direction. Mrs. Johnson, the accompanist at these concerts, was also presented with a valuable gold chain.

EPPING.—The Epping Choral Society gave a performance of Handel's oratorio 'Judas Maccabæus' at the Town Hall on April 13. The solo vocalists were Madame Maggie Purvis, Miss Margaret Tilton, Mr. Frederick Norcup, and Mr. Graham Smart. The Society had the assistance of the Epping Orchestral Society, who played the accompaniments throughout in a very praiseworthy manner. The choruses were well sung, 'Hear us, O Lord' and 'Fallen is the foe' being particularly worthy of mention. Mr. Stacey B. King accompanied on the pianoforte, and Mr. Henry Riding on the organ, Mr. Donald Penrose conducting.

FRASERBURGH.—The concert-version of Gounod's 'Faust' was successfully performed by the Choral Society in the Dalrymple Hall on April 1, the solo parts being sung by Miss Alice Smart, Miss Jessie Gray, Mr. Cynlais Gibbs,

Mr. Allan Ritchie and Mr. D. R. Smart. In the second part the choir sang the pieces which they are to perform next month at the Musical Festival in Aberdeen. These included 'Come away, sweet love,' 'Creation's Hymn,' and 'Waken, waken, day is dawning,' which were sung in a manner indicating a complete understanding between the choir and its conductor, Mr. Clemens.

GAINSBOROUGH.—Elgar's 'Banner of St. George' was given for the second time by the Philharmonic Society in the Town Hall on April 6. Mr. Samuel B. Dann conducted an excellent performance, the choir singing with spirit and precision, and being efficiently supported by the orchestra, led by Miss Hibbert. The solo vocalists were Miss Reenie Mason and Mr. Charles Nicholson. A feature of the concert was Mendelssohn's Concertstück in G minor, the solo part skilfully played by Miss Hilda F. Taylor.

HAYWARDS HEATH.—The Musical Society ended their season on April 4, with a concert consisting of Coleridge-Taylor's 'Wedding-feast,' and a miscellaneous selection. The tenor solo 'Onaway,' was sung by Mr. Samuel Masters in excellent style. Miss Allen also sang well, and Mr. W. Towell created a good impression by his violinello solo 'Czardas.' The concert was under the conductorship of Mr. R. J. Beckett, with Miss C. J. Lott as accompanist.

HEREFORD.—The Spring concert of the Choral Society took place in the Shire Hall on April 8, when Handel's 'Judas Maccabæus' was performed under the able direction of Dr. G. R. Sinclair. The choir, numbering about 200 voices, sang very finely throughout, and were efficiently assisted by the orchestra led by Mr. Bernhard Carrodus. The solo vocalists were Madame Le Mar, Miss Blanche Thomas, Mr. Charles Saunders, and Mr. Allister M. Proctor.

HETTON-LE-HOLE.—Handel's rarely-performed oratorio 'Belshazzar' was sung by the Primitive Methodist Church choir, with the assistance of a complete orchestra led by Mr. W. Straughan, on Good Friday. The choir, under the careful direction of Mr. W. R. Heckles, sang with enthusiasm, and the solo vocalists were Madame Sara Waggott, Mr. E. H. Knight (alto), Mr. J. H. Williamson and Mr. Lewellyn Roberts.

HUNTINGDON.—The Choral Society gave their second concert of the season on March 30, under the conductorship of Mr. Frank Clark, when Sullivan's 'Golden Legend' was performed. The various gradations of tone and the intelligent phrasing gave evidence of the efficient training they had received. A full and efficient orchestra was led by Mr. B. Hindenberg, and in the latter part of the programme gave brilliant interpretations of the overture to 'Oberon' and the 'Peer Gynt' suite. The choral march from 'Tannhäuser' concluded the concert. The soloists were Miss Gladys M. Honey, Miss Florence Atkin, Mr. Roland Jackson and Mr. Joseph Farrington.

IPSWICH.—The Choral Society so ably conducted by Mr. William Hockey gave a performance of Elgar's 'King Olaf' on April 6. The soloists, Miss Laura Evans-Williams, Mr. Henry Beaumont and Mr. Charles Knowles, together with the choir and orchestra, gave a highly spirited and intelligent rendering of the work, the choir and their conductor gaining special distinction. The second part of the programme included Elgar's part-song 'The snow,' by the ladies, and 'Chorus of dervishes,' from Beethoven's 'Ruins of Athens,' by the male voices of the choir.

KETERING.—The Choral Society gave a performance of Sir A. C. Mackenzie's 'Rose of Sharon,' on April 14. This fine, melodious work made a great impression, the delightful orchestration as rendered by the Society's orchestra being a feature of the concert, the choir singing with spirit, and the soprano part being taken at short notice by Miss Maud Wilby with great success. Miss Effie Martyn, Mr. Joseph Reed and Mr. Charles Wade were the other soloists. Mr. H. G. Gotch as usual conducted.

KIBWORTH.—Handel's 'Judas Maccabæus' was performed on April 9 at the Village Hall by the Fleckney and District Choral Society, under the direction of Mr. R. Iliffe, of Leicester, who may be commended for his training of the choir. The solo vocalists were Miss Daisy Pearson, Miss Edith Coleman, Mr. A. H. Dams and Mr. H. C. Iliffe.

KIDDERMINSTER.—Sullivan's 'Golden Legend' was performed by the Choral Society in the Town Hall on April 12. The solo vocalists were Miss Muriel Goodwin, Miss Mildred Jones, Mr. Frank Mullins and Mr. James Coleman. Both choir and orchestra did good service under the direction of Mr. J. Irving Glover. A short miscellaneous selection concluded with Beethoven's 'Hallelujah Chorus.'

LEICESTER.—The New Musical Society concluded their season on April 14, in the Temperance Hall, with a performance of Gounod's 'Messe Solennelle' and a selection from the same composer's 'Faust.' The solo parts in the Mass were interpreted by Miss Laura Evans-Williams, Mr. James Davis and Mr. Herbert Brown, Miss C. Hefford assisting in 'Faust.' Both choir and orchestra did excellent service, under the able direction of Mr. C. Hancock.

LEOMINSTER.—Sullivan's 'Golden Legend' was successfully performed by the Choral Society on April 7, under the able direction of Mr. Herbert E. Crimp. The solo vocalists were Miss Christine Bywater, Miss Amy Bosworth, Mr. Spencer Thomas, Mr. W. E. Pennell and Mr. Robert Chignell. Both as regards precision and tone the choir revealed excellent qualities, which were further displayed in Elgar's 'Go, song of mine,' in which the pitch was perfectly maintained. A complete and efficient orchestra, which included members of the Birmingham Symphony Orchestra, assisted.

LYMINGTON.—Concerts were given in the afternoon and evening of April 6, under the conductorship of Miss Amy Weldon. The programmes included as their chief features Spohr's 'God, Thou art great' and Mendelssohn's 'Hear my prayer,' the choir displaying good attack, precision and enunciation. They also gave with much effect Elgar's 'The King's way,' 'Matona, lovely maiden,' by Orlando Lassus, and Morley's 'Now is the month of maying.' The soloists were Miss W. Halsby, Miss Schreiber, Miss R. Halsby, Miss Stuckbury, Mr. Stevens and Mr. Canterbury, with Mr. Mark Collet (violin), Mr. Wakeford (pianoforte) and Miss Rose Nightingale (reciter).

MARKET DRAYTON.—A successful performance of 'Elijah' was given in the Town Hall on March 31, by the Musical Society under the direction of Mr. Fred Evans. Excellent work was done by both choir and orchestra, and the principal solo vocalists were Madame Aston, Miss Gertrude Pegg, Mr. Jesse Hackett and Mr. James Coleman.

NANTWICH.—Hiawatha's 'Wedding-feast' was performed by the Choral and Orchestral Society in the Town Hall, on April 6, under the conductorship of Mr. John James. The choir sang with freshness and clear enunciation, and the orchestra played effectively. The tenor solo was sung by Mr. John Collett.

NANTYGLO, MONMOUTHSHIRE.—The Nonconformist Festival Choral Society of this town gave two concerts on Wednesday and Good Friday, March 23 and 25, when Mendelssohn's 'Elijah' was performed successfully. The choir, numbering 160, sang with much energy and precision. The principal soloists were Miss Rachel James, Miss Helen Blain, Mr. Ben Calvert and Mr. W. Dan Richards. The accompaniments were efficiently played by the Blaينا Orchestral Society, with the Rev. David Williams at the pianoforte and Mr. W. J. Johnson at the organ. Mr. William Thomas Angell was the conductor.

OSWESTRY.—The Choral Society gave a concert on April 5, when the programme consisted of Mendelssohn's 'Hymn of Praise,' and Coleridge-Taylor's 'Meg Blane,' the performance of the latter work, with its fine choral and orchestral effects, being particularly good. The soloists were Miss Euneta Truscott and Mr. Frank Mullings, and a very efficient orchestra was led by Mr. H. H. Salt. Mr. A. E. Floyd conducted.

PETERHEAD.—Coleridge-Taylor's 'Hiawatha' Trilogy was performed by the Choral Society for the first time on March 30. The choir had evidently been thoroughly rehearsed and sang with much expression, reflecting credit both on themselves and their able conductor, Mr. W. T. Clemens, while the orchestra did capable service. The solo parts were sung by Miss Mabel Manson, Mr. Cynlais Gibbs and Mr. Charles Knowles.

RAMSGATE.—The first part of the Choral Society's concert on March 31 consisted of Elgar's 'King Olaf.' The principal vocalists were Miss Marion Perrott, Mr. Gwilym Richards and Mr. Montague Borwell. The choir and orchestra (numbering upwards of 150) were under the able direction of Mr. Vincent Henniker, and the effective manner in which the various numbers were rendered was a tribute to the skill and care bestowed upon their preparation by the conductor.

RHYL.—The Choral Society, assisted by Mr. Horace Houlden's Orchestra, gave a concert in the Pavilion on April 7, when Barnett's 'Ancient Mariner' and Parry's 'Blest pair of Sirens' were performed by the choir and orchestra with much credit to themselves and to their conductor, Mr. Richard Bromley. Miss Ada Forrest, Miss Winifred Lewis, Miss Letty Williams, Messrs. Ernest Pike and George Baker were the solo vocalists. After the concert a silver loving-cup was presented to Mr. W. J. P. Storey, the President of the Society, as a token of appreciation.

RUTHIN.—On April 14, the Choral Society gave a very creditable performance of Franco Leoni's 'Gate of life.' The band and chorus numbered about 100, the solos being taken respectively by Miss Nellie Finch, Mr. Thomas Thomas and Mr. Samuel Mann. The work is said to have been the best performance yet given by the Society, reflecting credit on Mr. W. A. Lloyd, the conductor.

SEVENOAKS.—The Choral and Orchestral Society gave their twenty-first concert on April 13, when Gounod's 'Faust' (Novello's concert selection) was performed. The accompaniments were efficiently played by a string orchestra (led by Mr. A. G. Whitehead), with Miss Katharine Fletcher at the pianoforte. The solo parts were undertaken by Miss Winifred Dixon, Miss Winifred Ponder, Mr. Hubert Eisdell and Mr. Arthur Rose. The second part included Lee Williams's 'Song of the pedlar,' well sung by the choir, and Mozart's suite 'Eine kleine Nachtmusik,' for strings. Mr. W. A. Taylor conducted.

SKEGNESS.—The Musical Society gave their annual concert in the King's Hall, on March 31, when the chief features of the programme were Schumann's 'Pilgrimage of the rose' and Stanford's 'The Revenge.' The soloists in the first-named work were Miss Dorothy Cook-Smith, Madame Amy Dewhurst, Mr. Harry Hartley and Mr. Robin Overleigh, the choir being heard to best advantage in 'The Revenge.' There was a small orchestra, and Mr. Siegfried Richter (of Spalding) conducted.

SOLIHULL.—The Choral Society gave an excellent concert at the Public Hall on April 13. The programme included Gade's 'Spring's message,' and 'The forsaken merman,' by Dr. A. Somervell. The recently formed Solihull Orchestral Society, which also gave a selection of modern music, played the accompaniments. Mr. Ralph Ingram was the bass soloist in Somervell's cantata, and Mr. S. Lindsay Kearne conducted.

SPENNYMOOR.—The Mount Pleasant Wesleyan Choir held their sixth annual concert on March 23, when Handel's oratorio 'Judas Maccabeus' was performed, accompanied by a very efficient orchestra under the conductorship of Mr. T. I. Shields. The solo vocalists were Madame Naomi Odille Bell, Mr. Arthur Greenwood and Mr. Charlesworth George. Mr. J. T. Dixon was at the pianoforte. The choir sang well, their precision and attack being the most noteworthy features in their performance.

STIRLING.—The Stirling Choral Society gave a performance of the 'Messiah' in the Albert Hall on March 31, under the able conductorship of Dr. A. W. Marchant. The choir sang with good attack, expression and enthusiasm, and were supported by a small orchestra, led by Mr. W. H. Cole. The solo vocalists were Miss Emily Breare, Miss May Currie, Mr. John Jamieson and Mr. Charles Knowles.

STROUD (GLOUCS.).—The Choral Society's Concert on April 7 included Parts I. and II. of 'The Creation' and Parry's 'Voces Clamantium.' The soloists—Madame Emily Squire, Mr. Cynlais Gibbs and Mr. Watkin Mills—acquired themselves admirably, and the chorus-singing was very excellent. Mr. S. W. Underwood conducted.

SUDBURY.—An excellent performance of 'Judas Maccabæus' was given in the Drill Hall on April 5. The solo vocalists were Miss Christine Bywater, Miss Florence Taylor, Mr. Frank J. Webster and Mr. John Prout. Mr. E. E. Vinnicombe conducted.

TEWKESBURY.—The opening of the George Watson Memorial Hall took place on April 12, with a performance by the Philharmonic Society of the 'Death of Minnehaha,' and Haydn's 'Spring.' The solo parts were sung by Madame Aimée Wathen-Cole, Mr. Albert Watson, and Mr. Robin Overleigh. The choir, under the conductorship of Mr. A. W. V. Vine, sang with precision and firmness, receiving able support from the orchestra. Elgar's part-songs 'As torrents in summer' and 'O happy eyes' were also sung by the choir.

TONBRIDGE.—A highly successful performance of Elgar's 'King Olaf' was given by the Choral Society under the conductorship of Mr. George J. Kimmins, on March 30. The band and chorus numbered 120. The solos were in the capable hands of Miss Maude Willby, Mr. Gwilym Richards and Mr. Herbert Tracey.

WALLASEY.—The St. John's Choral Society gave a performance of 'Hiawatha,' Parts 1 and 2, on April 6. The solo vocalists were Mr. Robert Walker, Mr. Leslie Barnett, and Mr. Samuel Mann, and both choir and orchestra did efficient service under the able direction of Mr. William Billier. Miss Bertha Bridgman and Miss Millward assisted at the pianoforte.

WELLS.—The Musical Association gave a concert on April 12 in the Guildhall, when the principal features of the programme were Cowen's 'John Gilpin,' and the 3rd Act of 'Tannhäuser.' The choir fully realised and entered into the spirit of both works, and were very efficiently assisted by the orchestra (led by Mr. Maurice Alexander), who were specially successful in the 'Siegfried Idyll.' The solo vocalists were Miss Eveline Gerrish, Mr. J. S. Perry, and Mr. R. T. A. Hughes. Congratulations are due to the Rev. Dr. Davis for the skill he displayed in conducting an excellent performance.

WHITCHURCH (SALOP).—The annual concert of the Choral Society took place on April 6, when Sir Hubert Parry's 'Pied Piper' and Gade's 'Erl King's Daughter' were performed. The solo vocalists were Mrs. Annie Walker, Mrs. Wicks, Mr. Hoptroff and Mr. Bridge-Peters. The choir gave a very good interpretation of both works. The orchestra was led by Mr. Dunworth, and Mr. W. E. Rogers conducted.

WITNEY.—Handel's 'Judas Maccabæus' was successfully performed by the Choral Society, assisted by the Witney Orchestral Society, at the New Schools on April 5, under the conductorship of Mr. H. W. Young. The solo vocalists were Miss Mabel Manson, Miss Violet Oppenshaw, Mr. Braxton Smith and Mr. Thorpe Bates. Mr. G. H. Hazlehurst led the orchestra.

WOOLWICH.—The Borough of Woolwich Orchestral Society gave a concert at the Town Hall on Good Friday, when the programme included the first two movements from Beethoven's Symphony No. 5, in C minor, the overtures to 'Magic flute,' 'Ruy Blas' and 'Oberon,' and Bach's Gavotte in E (for strings). In the performance of these works the orchestra gave evidence of very careful rehearsal under the conductor, Mr. Sidney Horton, who also gave an artistic rendering of Mendelssohn's Capriccio brilliant in B minor (for pianoforte and orchestra), this item being conducted by Mr. Lionel Horton. The solo vocalists were Miss Winifred Burke, Miss Esther Franklin and Mr. Stewart Gardner.

WORTHING.—Mr. Hawkins's Symphony Orchestra gave a concert at St. James's Hall on April 5. The programme included Schubert's 'Unfinished symphony' in B minor; Allegro vivace from the 'Jupiter' symphony (Mozart); 'Träumerei,' from 'Russian suite' (Wuerst); Valse triste (Sibelius); Valse 'Sans le Chœur,' from the opera 'Eugene Onégin' (Tchaikovsky); and Quartet in F (Guy Michell). The soloists for the occasion were Miss Mollie Wisden, Miss Janet Crowhurst and Mr. G. W. Barnard (vocalists); Miss Eileen Kirkpatrick (violincellist) and Miss Berkeley-Calcott (recitations). Miss Winifred Jones acted as accompanist, and Mr. H. A. Hawkins conducted.

Answers to Correspondents.

C. F.—The chief utility of the pedal is to sustain notes which the hand cannot hold, and to add sonority and continuosness to the sound. Rules for its use cannot be compressed here. It should not be used to make chords overlap. We are afraid that inferior players often use it to cover bad technique.

ELBE.—Your young man and girl with no training cannot be much assisted in voice-production matters by written recommendations. Better get advice from some competent person who can try their voices and musical capacity. The little manual 'The Art of Singing,' by J. Herbert Sims Reeves (Novello) may be of some service.

A. BOYFIELD.—No. 1, Twelve short pieces (Book xi.), Smart, about M 66 to the minim. The Boyce (a) Prelude and (b) Fugue, from the 'Young Organist,' (a) crotchet M 74, and (b) crotchet M 92: see West's 'Old English Organ Music,' No. 15, Novello & Co.

B. PHILLIPS.—The fact that your violin is labelled 'Antonius Stradivarius,' &c., proves nothing. There are tens of thousands of violins so labelled, some of which can be purchased for about 7s. 6d., although they are not worth the money.

CRAIGPARK.—An arrangement of the Largo in D from Haydn's Symphony in G (Letter V.) is published in Westbrook's Voluntaries for the Organ, No. 5, price one shilling (Novello & Co.).

MISS FARROW.—Bendl, Jaell, Raff and Liszt have all arranged Wagner's 'Preislied' for the pianoforte. All these arrangements are published abroad, but they can be obtained from Novello & Co.

AKTE.—It is impossible to advise you safely without hearing you sing. Your alto voice may be of real value to you, and you should not hastily abandon it.

CHORAL.—Mr. L. C. Venables has written a very good book on the business of 'Choral and Orchestral Societies.' It is published by Messrs. Curwen.

E. ABBOTT.—It is impossible to assess the value of your Klotz violin without actual experience of its tone and condition.

MRS. J. D. SPENCE (Washington).—We regret that so far we have not been able to trace the air.

Miss G. Huntingdon asks whether choral scholarships are offered to boys by Nonconformist choirs. We are not aware of any.

Many others are unavoidably held over or have been answered privately.

ERRATUM.—'How a trumpet is made.'—Mr. D. J. Blaikley writes: On page 225 in reference to the use of the fourth valve, the sentence 'with the first and second to produce D,' should read 'with the first and third to produce D.'

THE OFFICE FOR THE HOLY COMMUNION

SET TO MUSIC BY

JOHN MERBECKE

(A.D. 1550).

EDITED, WITH AN ACCOMPANIMENT FOR ORGAN

BY

BASIL HARWOOD.

This edition of Merbecke's Communion Service is based on Rimbault's reprint of 1871, after a careful comparison with a copy of the original edition of 1550 belonging to the Library of Christ Church, Oxford. The Plain Song is presented as nearly as possible in the form in which it first appeared, only such changes having been introduced as are required by the altered wording of our Prayer Book.

TOILERS OF THE DEEP

CANTATA

FOR FEMALE VOICES

VERSE BY JAMES STRANG

MUSIC BY

ALFRED R. GAUL.

"The musical settings are twelve in number, the part-writing for first and second sopranos and contraltos. The utmost care and finish has been bestowed in wedding appropriate music to the verse, and Mr. Gaul has written nothing finer, nor more melodious and captivating in this branch of composition specially adapted for High Schools for Girls. The cantata begins with an instrumental introduction in the form of a barcarolle, in G minor, 9-8 time, moderato. At the close the tempo changes to 2-4, Allegro agitato, descriptive of an approaching storm. But this is of short duration and leads to the chorus, 'Toiling and tossed on the restless sea,' which is dramatic and spirited in character, the theme being based upon a bright melody, and the part-writing remarkably effective. No. 2 is a Cradle Song, 'Come, my baby,' in G major, Andante moderato, 3-4 time, allotted to a contralto. The accompaniment to this delightful lullaby is constructed on a pedal note, the melody that accompanies it being at once expressive and thoroughly characteristic. The chorus which immediately follows the cradle song opens with a tempestuous instrumental introduction of chromatic scale-passages and chords, the key now changing into C major, 12-8 time, Allegro con fuoco. At the fourteenth bar the chorus enters with 'Oh, ho! for the winds that blow'; the whole of this number being of an impassionate and restless character. Quite in contrast to the foregoing is the pretty ballad for soprano, 'A mermaid dwelt,' which closely follows the chorus. It is in Tempo di Barcarolle in F major, 6-8 time, quaint and most espressivo. A short unaccompanied trio, 'The twilight gray is falling,' brings us to what may be termed the gem of the work, a song for soprano, 'O, my heart's heart.' The key is E flat major, 2-4 time, Andantino espressivo. Mr. Gaul is here in his happiest mood, the whole song being graceful and charming to a degree. The number that follows is the chorus 'Darker and darker grows the night,' which is preceded by a characteristic instrumental prelude in triplet passages, 2-2 time, C minor, Allegro con fuoco. The whole of this chorus will deeply impress the attentive listener. No. 8, 'A prayer for those at sea,' for chorus, with an organ accompaniment, is in the key of F, 3-4 time, alla cappella, and is another example of purely melodious part-writing which characterises Mr. Gaul's compositions, and which is certainly conceived in his best and most expressive manner. The concluding numbers are a short Intermezzo, entitled 'Break of day,' a duet for soprano and contralto, 'Through golden mists of morn,' in the key of B flat, 12-8 time, Allegretto con moto, an exceedingly animated movement; then comes another cradle song, expressive of the father's safe return from sea, and, finally, the concluding joyous chorus, 'Now let songs of gladness rise.' Taking the cantata as a whole, it is a delightful work, replete with artistic workmanship, and, above all, melodious and expressive."—Birmingham Daily Mail.

THE ELFIN HILL

AN OPERETTA FOR SCHOOL USE

MUSIC BY

ALFRED R. GAUL.

"The 'Elfin Hill' is founded on one of Hans Andersen's charming stories, and the libretto has been written in dainty and graceful language by Miss Baldwin. The operetta opens with a short overture describing moonlight on the Dovrefeld Mountains, and Mr. Gaul has been particularly happy in infusing the Norse spirit into that portion of his music which deals with goblin life in Norway. When the goblins become visitors in fairyland, the character of the music changes; lightness is its predominant feature, perhaps the choicest fragment being a fairy dance. This latter, together with a very characteristic dance of elves and a shadow dance, were beautifully executed."—Birmingham Gazette.

"Mr. A. R. Gaul, of Birmingham, has a wider fame than any other English composer, even though his works have not attained the popularity of the barrel-organs to which Mendelssohn jocosely aspired. Six Songs for Voices of Medium Compass quite sustain the composer's reputation for graceful music, which on the one hand satisfies the judgment of the musician, and on the other speaks to the amateur in terms that he understands. . . . They are modern without the drear unbecomingness which is the note of the most modern modernity. Mr. Gaul is of a school which continues to hold that beauty is an essential of good music, and that the aridly intellectual impressionism of advanced schools is hardly music at all."—Birmingham Daily Gazette.

"By the production of these Trios our townsman, Mr. A. R. Gaul, has made a valuable addition to the many beautiful and useful compositions he has formerly given to the public. Mr. Gaul's music is unfailingly charming, the voice-parts being so disposed that they may be easily learnt, and the accompaniments are as characteristic as they are pretty. Each separate piece is so good that we cannot make references to special favourites. Young ladies who take pleasure in part-singing will find variety in the collection, and both in the home-circle and in the school class Mr. Gaul's new work is sure to be heartily welcomed."—Birmingham Daily Gazette.

"Other novelties included Dr. W. H. Speer's Suite, 'Cinderella,' which was written for the Festival. The story upon which it is built is a familiar one; the themes are 'taking,' and the orchestration is pleasing. 'Cinderella' had a send-off sufficiently encouraging to know that the work will float rapidly into popular favour."—Musical News.

"Dr. Speer's 'Cinderella' Suite contains some smooth, pleasing music, notably a charming Pavan."—Athenaeum.

"A 'Cinderella' Suite by Dr. W. H. Speer, a musician who is well known in the South, and whose name is not wholly unfamiliar in London, contains some very pleasant and melodious writing, some of it very fanciful and charming."—Daily Chronicle.

"The Suite may be recommended to the attention of amateur orchestral societies. The music is melodious—it is pleasing, and makes small demands on executive abilities."—Referee.

"A novelty was a pleasing and fanciful Suite by another Sussex composer, Dr. W. H. Speer, on the subject of 'Cinderella.'"—Sunday Times.

"The Suite, illustrative of Cinderella's career, as conveyed by the familiar fairy story, is a beautifully expressive piece of writing, replete with tuneful melodies richly harmonized. The rendering of the attractive work was warmly appreciated, and the composer was recalled."—Sussex Daily News.

"Dr. Speer's music is certainly of that graceful, pleasant kind which relieves a tired attention; but it seemed to one to have qualities that would have repaid an even more critical examination. It is true fairy-tale music, light, flexible, and fanciful, and it falls most gratefully on the ear. The 'Wedding March' is spirited and picturesque."—Brighton Herald.

ENDYMION'S DREAM

CANTATA

FOR SOPRANO AND TENOR SOLI, CHORUS AND ORCHESTRA

THE WORDS BY

C. R. B. BARRETT

THE MUSIC BY

S. COLERIDGE-TAYLOR.

Price One Shilling and Sixpence.

DAILY TELEGRAPH.

A short cantata, this, which occupies little more than half-an-hour in performance, it is likely to become popular on account of the pleasant nature of its music, even though a good deal more use might be, and perhaps should have been, made of the chorus. But not since, in his student days, Mr. Coleridge-Taylor evolved the opening part of his "Hiawatha" trilogy, has he composed music that seemed so grateful and so inevitable. . . . There are in the score many pages in which the composer's own individuality appears unmistakably, and his is a decidedly interesting individuality. This, combined with the picturesqueness of the music, the dramatic nature of the "book," and the comparative freedom of the score from ultra-modern difficulties, should enable the cantata to find many a hearing, more especially in choirs and places where the pitch is not so high as in use at Brighton.

MORNING POST.

His music shows no decrease in choral effect, and this remains the composer's strong point and the outstanding feature of the work. . . . Mr. Coleridge-Taylor is to be commended for his appreciation of the design best suited to the theme of the union of Sun and Moon. His eloquence of musical utterance, his command of orchestral colour, and his grasp of fundamental principles of choral writing are present throughout.

STANDARD.

Seldom has so much urgent music—music that breathes and reeks of romance and passion in almost every bar—been compressed into so small a compass. . . . At a time when the future of English opera is upon every one's lips it is encouraging to meet with a work that reveals a sense of the theatre so unmistakably as does Mr. Coleridge-Taylor's so-called cantata. The composer employs the representative theme, but he employs it with discretion, and the orchestral writing throughout is both free and unfettered. Notwithstanding that the passion is nothing if not cumulative, the skill with which he avoids an anti-climax is remarkable. A delightfully atmospheric chorus of stars—constellations—founded on a descending chromatic figure, leads to Seleno's solo, which contains some of the most beautiful music in the work; indeed, throughout the vocal writing is of an unusually grateful nature. Moreover, Mr. Coleridge-Taylor's stock of orchestral device and colour is unfailing.

PALM MALL GAZETTE.

Words which Mr. Coleridge-Taylor has wedded to appropriate and delightful music. . . . The work will undoubtedly add to Mr. Coleridge-Taylor's laurels.

MANCHESTER GUARDIAN.

The new cantata will not improbably rank high among the composer's works, for it seems to mark a distinct advance in his musical individuality. . . . The themes are in themselves striking and dramatically expressive. . . . He is more terse, more concentrated, and just as picturesque as ever, and he reveals almost unsuspected dramatic power.

OBSERVER.

It is the most vital work he has written for a long time. He has not since his early days so well resisted the temptation to set down superfluous things just because they come easily to him, and this is only another way of saying that it is conciser and better balanced than anything he has composed for a long time. It also shows a finer sense of climax and of dramatic music as distinct from that which is merely superficially picturesque.

ATHENÆUM.

Mr. S. Coleridge-Taylor's "Endymion's Dream," a cantata of modest proportions, but one of which the freshness and rhythmic life, and the dramatic and poetical character of the music, recall the composer's "Hiawatha."

WORLD.

Coleridge-Taylor's "Dream of Endymion" is likely to rank as his best work since "Hiawatha," for it is stronger and terser, and gives proof of greater intellectuality without loss of the qualities of sensuous charm which always distinguishes Mr. Coleridge-Taylor, even when he is least his best self.

These Pianoforte Studies have been highly praised by M. VLADIMIR DE PACHMANN, who has expressed his intention of playing some of them during his Recital Tour in the United States. His testimonial is published with the Work, which consists of Twelve Numbers, specially designed to develop power and skill in the fourth and fifth fingers. The importance of trying to equalize these weaker fingers with the stronger ones is unquestionable, as defective execution is more often traceable to this inequality of the fingers than to any other cause.

PROGRESSIVE STUDIES

FOR THE PIANOFORTE

EDITED, ARRANGED IN GROUPS, AND THE FINGERING REVISED AND SUPPLEMENTED

BY

FRANKLIN TAYLOR.

THIS Collection of Studies is intended to illustrate the various elements of a complete course of pianoforte technique, and to provide students with the means of attacking and overcoming the different special difficulties which have to be encountered. With this view, the Studies have been arranged in groups, those in each group being placed in progressive order, and having reference to some one particular difficulty. The greater part of the studies themselves have been selected from the standard works of the most eminent Study-writers, and with these are included numerous others, which, though of equally great practical utility, have hitherto been less generally accessible.

SELECTED PIANOFORTE STUDIES

PROGRESSIVELY ARRANGED BY

FRANKLIN TAYLOR.

IN TWO SETS (EIGHT BOOKS), PRICE ONE SHILLING AND SIXPENCE EACH BOOK.

THE present collection of Studies is designed to provide teachers with a short course of Pianoforte Technique adapted to the needs of the average pupil, the intention being to spare the teacher the labour of choosing a sufficiently varied selection from the large mass of material existing, and at the same time to ensure that the different departments of technique shall be undertaken in the order which experience has proved to be the most beneficial.

The Studies are grouped in two Sets, and are so arranged that the different Books in which they are contained may be taken in consecutive order, but pupils who are already further advanced than the elementary stage represented by Set I. may commence at once with Set II., which will be found to be complete in itself, and to illustrate all the essential elements of technique.

Where additional studies are desired, or studies on certain subjects which are not touched upon in this series, the larger collection, published under the title of "Progressive Studies" (from which the present examples have been selected), is of course available.

SEVENTH AND REVISED EDITION.

A HANDBOOK OF EXAMINATIONS IN MUSIC

CONTAINING

600 QUESTIONS WITH ANSWERS

BY

ERNEST A. DICKS,

Fellow of the Royal College of Organists.

PREFACE TO THE SEVENTH EDITION.

Through the kindness of Dr. E. H. Turpin the seventh edition of the Handbook of Examinations in Music includes the latest type of Papers set by Trinity College of Music, London, in their scheme of Local Examinations in Musical Knowledge.

The work will also be found to have been considerably enlarged by the addition of fifty specimen questions, with answers. They have been designed for the most part after the manner of those set in the Theory Paper for the L.R.A.M. Diploma, and also that required by candidates for the Higher Practical Examinations held by Trinity College of Music, London. The author earnestly hopes that these additions will considerably enhance the value of the Handbook, and render it increasingly helpful to students.

TECHNIQUE AND EXPRESSION IN PIANOFORTE PLAYING BY FRANKLIN TAYLOR.

EXTRACT FROM PREFACE.

In the course of my experience as a teacher of the pianoforte, an experience extending over many years, certain ideas have from time to time suggested themselves to me which have proved useful—to myself, as enabling me to express more clearly that which I desired my pupils to understand, and to my pupils, as tending to facilitate their comprehension of the various difficulties they have had to encounter, at the same time leading them to perceive the most practical means of overcoming them, and thus accelerating their general rate of progress.

These suggestions relate to both the mechanical and intellectual sides of the study of pianoforte-playing, or, briefly, to Technique and Expression, the chief matters implied by the first of these terms being the production of various qualities of tone, the choice of suitable fingering, and the best methods of attacking certain difficulties; while the second, which may perhaps be more aptly designated the means of expression, includes rhythm, phrasing, variety and gradation of tone, the use of the pedals, et cætera.

A Modern School for the Violin

BY

AUGUST WILHELMJ AND JAMES BROWN.

THE purpose of this Work is to provide, in one systematic and comprehensive scheme, all that is necessary for the acquirement of the Art of Modern Violin Playing.

"A Modern School for the Violin" consists of Six Books devoted to Daily Technical Practice, Six Books of Studies for Violin alone, and a large number of Pieces with Pianoforte Accompaniment, the Violin parts being specially edited for the purposes of teaching.

SECTION A.—TECHNICAL PRACTICE. IN SIX BOOKS.

The foundation of "A Modern School for the Violin" is laid by means of a series of Six Books dealing exclusively with the important subject of DAILY TECHNICAL PRACTICE. The First Book of Technical Practice (Book 1A) is limited to the 1st Position; the Second Book (2A) to the 1st, 2nd, and 3rd Positions; the Third Book (3A) to the first five Positions; and so on. Bowings and other technical devices are introduced in a similarly progressive manner throughout. Each Book of Technical Practice is divided into "Lessons" (or Chapters), and each Lesson contains a number of short repeating Exercises on some definite point of Violin Technique—as Fingering, Bowing, &c., with the needful explanations. Included in each Book will be found a complete set of Scales and Arpeggi, arranged according to the particular stage of advancement reached.

Taken as a whole, this section is intended to facilitate, and to insist on, a thorough, steady, and continuous progress in the mastery of the Instrument, this being the only possible means of preparing the groundwork for artistic achievement with all its lasting delights.

SECTION B.—STUDIES. IN SIX BOOKS.

Section B is formed of a series of original and selected Studies, in Six Books. Each Book of Studies (Section B) is carefully co-ordinated, in respect of difficulty and range of subject, with the correspondingly numbered Book of Technical Practice (Section A). Thus the First Book of Studies (1B) is written in the 1st Position; the Second Book (2B) in the 1st, 2nd, and 3rd Positions; the 3rd Book (3B) in all Positions up to and including the 5th; and so on. It should further be explained that the two Sections are designed to complement one another, and that the "School" must be practised, not in single Books of Technical Practice and Studies alternately, but in pairs. Thus, Books 1A and 1B are to be taken concurrently, then Books 2A and 2B, 3A and 3B, and so on, and the appropriate pairs are now issued bound together in cloth (see Cloth Bindings below).

MORECAMBE.

May 4, 5, 6, 7.

We are glad to know that the entries this year promise a very successful festival. There will, as usual, be a church choir festival on the evening of the first day. The local choirs and soloists will gather on the 5th, and on that evening there will be a concert at which a massed performance of Mendelssohn's "95th Psalm" will be given. The 6th (Friday) will be devoted to the children. The feature of the concert will be Dr. Hathaway's children's cantata "Jack Horner's ride." The great day will be on Saturday, the 7th. Seven female-voice, four male-voice (tenor lead), eight male-voice (alto lead), seven small mixed-voice, and no fewer than nine "Challenge Shield" class mixed-voice choirs will compete. The adjudicators will be Professor Bantock, Mr. Frederick Corder, Mr. Sydney Nicholson, Mr. T. Tertius Noble, Dr. Hathaway, Mr. C. H. Fogg, and Miss E. Robinson (violin). We hope the festival will draw large audiences.

ABERDEEN.

June 2, 3, 4.

We are glad to hear that the entries for this year's festival are so numerous that it has been found necessary to apportion an additional day for the work. The festival will therefore cover three days. Professor Terry (the honorary secretary) and his committee are heartily to be congratulated on the very satisfactory result of their labours. The entries are about double the number of last year. Thirty-five adult choirs, eleven school choirs, two working-girls' choirs, four string orchestras, and two mixed orchestras will compete. Dr. McNaught will adjudicate. At the Church Choir Festival service thirty-three choirs will be represented, and a special combined chorus will give "The Messiah" under Dr. Coward.

THE ASSOCIATION OF MUSICAL COMPETITION FESTIVALS.

The above Association will hold its sixth annual conference at Messrs. Broadwood's, Conduit Street, on July 14, at 10.45 a.m.; Lady Mary Trefusis will take the chair. The following papers will be read (morning session): "Choral Training," Mr. R. W. Wilson (Manchester); "Expression," Mr. Walter Ford; and "The Competition of Church Choirs," the Rev. A. Commeline.

Afternoon session: "The Training of Boys' Voices in Church Choirs," Dr. Varley Roberts, Magdalen College, Oxford; "The Cultivation of Vocal Tone" (with illustrations by a small class), Dr. H. Hulbert; and "The Dorset Choral Association," Miss F. Kindersley.

A meeting of the delegates forming the Council will be held on July 13, at 11.0 a.m.

Anyone can join the Association on payment of two and sixpence per annum. Membership entitles to admission to the conference. The hon. secs. are Miss Wakefield and Dr. W. G. McNaught. All communications should be addressed to the acting secretary, Miss E. Maddock, 22, Addison Court Gardens, London, W.

OAKHAM.

March 10.

These competitions, which were suspended last year, were revived with good results. They are open to the county of Rutland. Mr. Harry Evans adjudicated, and awarded first positions to the following choirs:

SCHOOL CHOIRS.

(Two entries in each class.)

Two-part song.—Langham (Mr. McClelland).
Unison song.—Wing (Mr. Ferguson).
Unison song.—Hambleton (Mr. Riggall).
Sight-singing.—Empingham (Mr. Forsyth) and Wing (Mr. Ferguson).

ADULT CHOIRS.

Anthem (5 entries).—Oakham (Mr. Nicholson).
Anthem (village choirs, 8 entries).—Preston (Miss Codrington).
Male-voice (4 entries).—Manton and Exton (Mr. G. S. Penny).
Female-voice (11 entries).—Wing (Mrs. Neill).
Chorus (15 entries).—Oakham (Mr. Nicholson).
Madrigal (5 entries).—Uppingham (Miss Clarke).
Part-song (7 entries).—Preston (Miss Codrington).
Sight-singing.—Uppingham.

The Hon. Mrs. Charles Fitzwilliam, of Barnsdale, Oakham, is the chief promoter.

STAMFORD HILL.

March 19, 21.

The seventh annual Eisteddfod, held by the Young People's Guild of Stamford Hill Congregational Church, passed off successfully at the Lecture Hall, Portland Avenue. In the one choral event, Sullivan's "Hymn of the Homeland" and German's "Who is Sylvia" were the tests. Three choirs entered:

Queen's Road (Mr. Walter Penn).
1st. The Guild Choir (Mr. James Burch).
The Northolme Choir (Mr. Charles W. Jones).

There were also solo singing and instrumental competitions. Large audiences attended. Dr. McNaught adjudicated.

BOURNE (SOUTH KESTEVEN).

April 5, 6.

Excellent and encouraging results were obtained at this year's competitions. A good standard was maintained in the contests, and the concluding concert (conducted by Mr. N. Snow) was the most successful that has been given under the auspices of the festival. Dr. McNaught was the adjudicator. In the school competitions, prizes were won by Abbey Church S. S., Congregational S. S., and Witham-on-the-Hill, Morton; the two last mentioned divided the prize for sight-singing. The whole of the competing children joined in a performance of "The Mermaid," under Dr. McNaught's direction.

The senior competitions included three for the singing of anthems, in which the successful choirs were Boston, Bourne Baptist and Market Deeping. Out of ten competing ladies' trios, the winners were Miss Hartshorn, Miss Ida Stubley and Mrs. Casburn. The successful quartet parties were Mr. Bell's, in both mixed-voice and male-voice divisions. Eight female-voice choirs sang Luard-Selby's "Flow down, cold rivulet," Mr. Leary's Choir proving the best. In the class for male-voice choirs, Bantock's "Boot and saddle" was the test-piece, and Mr. Stubley's Choir were the winners out of three entries. In the two classes for mixed-voice choral singing, the competing choirs, tests and results were as follows:

Test: "Song of the flax-spinner" (Leslie).

1st. Castle Bytham.

2nd. Edenham.

Thurby.

Witham-on-the-Hill.

Test: "O lovely May" (German).

1st. Mr. Leary's Choir.

2nd. Billingborough.

Castle Bytham.

Mr. Stubley's Choir.

Mr. Stubley's Choir were easy winners in the sight-singing contest, and they also secured the challenge banner for aggregate marks.

At the evening concert the prizes were distributed by the Countess of Ancaster, who was the originator, and still is the supporter of the scheme. The arrangements under Miss Bell were smooth and satisfactory.

PONTEFRACT.

April 5, 6, 7.

Except on the "open" day, good entries were obtained at this year's competitions, which were again excellently managed under the presidency of Mr. F. S. Hatchard. The lack of ready support for the chief competitions is attributed by the Yorkshire Post to a dearth of conductors and not to a want of enthusiasm on the part of choralsists. The chief awards were as follows:

JUNIOR COMPETITIONS.

Choral sight-reading, Sol-fa (6 entries).—Wakefield St. Michael's Boys.

Choral sight-reading, Staff (6 entries).—Knotteling National.

School choirs (small schools).—Loseoe Road Provided School.

School choirs (larger schools, 7 entries).—Brotherton Provided School.

School choirs (three-part song, 9 entries).—Rothwell National.

Action song.—Ossett Southdale School.

Friendly Societies, &c.—Pontefract G. F. S.

VILLAGE COMPETITIONS.

Female-voice choirs.—Darrington.

Male-voice choirs.—Monk Fryston.

Madrigal singing (5 entries).—Darrington.

Church choirs.—Wentbridge.

Choral societies.—Darrington.

Choral sight-reading (5 entries).—Darrington.

OPEN COMPETITIONS.

Soprano and tenor duet.—Miss Florence Reeve and Mr. Edgar R. Maude.

Contralto.—Miss D. Misson.

Bass.—Mr. W. Barrand.

Chanting and hymns.—Cudworth, St. John's Church Choir.

Anthem.—Cudworth, St. John's Church Choir.

Choral sight-reading and chief choral contest (1 entry).—Brotherton.

Female-voice choirs not only mustered in force, but sang exceedingly well, the lowest marks awarded being 80 per cent. of the maximum:

1st. Pontefract Ladies'.

2nd. Pontefract Girls' Evening Home.

3rd. Ladies' Madrigal Club.

Monk Fryston.

Featherstone and Purston.

Normanton.

Darrington.

Dr. Walford Davies was the adjudicator.

LEIGH (LANCS).

April 9.

The twelfth annual festival was a great success. There was a record number of competitors—22 choirs and over 170 individuals. The principal awards were as follows:

MIXED-VOICE CHOIRS.

Test: "The heavens are telling" (Haydn).

Oldham Glee and Madrigal.

Bolton Co-operative.

Ashton-in-Makerfield Musical Society.

Ashton-in-Makerfield Welsh Wesleyan.

Prescot and District.

1st. Hope Vocal Union, Denton (Mr. J. Hardy).

LARGE MALE-VOICE CHOIRS.

Test: "The Son of God" (Jenkins).

Wigan Harmonic.

Hope Vocal Union, Denton.

1st. Warrington (Mr. W. S. Nesbitt).

SMALL MALE-VOICE CHOIRS.

Test: "The martyrs of the arena" (de Rillé). 12 entries.

1st. Denton (Mr. J. Hardy) and Hindley Co-operative (Mr. Layland).

Children's choir (1 entry).—Lowton Common Methodist. Test:

"Go, Springtime, go" (Dr. Lloyd).

Mr. Wilfrid Jones and Mr. G. W. Hughes adjudicated.

RETFORD (NORTH NOTTS).

April 12, 13, 14.

As this festival appeals to a somewhat limited area it can hardly be expected to expand indefinitely, and it can be accounted satisfactory that the entries of this year equalled those of the year before last. Under the able management of Mrs. Peake and the admirable platform generalship of Mr. Bruce Webster, the competitions passed off with success. Mr. Harry Evans and Mr. W. McNaught, jun., were the adjudicators.

The winners in solo competitions were Misses Brook and Parker (junior duet), Miss Spencer and Mr. Hewerdine (soprano and tenor duet), Miss K. Stone (soprano), Mrs. Charles Marris (alto), Mr. Scaif (tenor), Mr. B. Titterton (bass), and Mr. R. G. Bradshaw's mixed-voice and male-voice quartets.

In the school choir competitions, prizes were awarded to Grove (Miss Staniland) and East Markham (Mr. W. Powell) in elementary classes; Retford Wesleyan Girls (Mr. J. Smith) and Workshop Abbey Boys (Mr. T. Pickford) in voice-production classes; Harworth (Mr. H. Stamp), East Markham and Retford Wesleyan, for sight-reading. The entries and results in the chief class, for which the test-piece was "The dewdrop's folly" (Myles B. Foster), were as follows:

Workshop Abbey (Mr. T. Pickford).

2nd. Retford National (Miss Lugs).

Retford Wesleyan (Mr. J. Smith).

1st. Retford Pupil Teachers (Mr. T. Hercy Denman).

Retford Girls' C. S. (Miss Durnford).

Workshop St. John's (Mr. L. Waller).

Retford Grammar School (Mr. H. C. Andrews).

Tuxford Choristers (Mr. G. H. Ellis).

Retford High School (Miss E. M. Webb).

Retford Congregational (Mr. G. White).

The second day was devoted to competitions for village choirs. Prizes were won by Gringley (sight-reading), Rampton (female-voice choirs), Ranskill (male-voice choirs), Rampton Wesleyan (mixed-voice church choirs), Babworth (church choirs of boys and men), Ranskill (choral societies not previously successful), and a quartet party (mixed-voice) from Bawtry. In the chief village choral contest, the entries and awards were as follows:

Tests: (a) Madrigal, "Hard by a fountain" (Waelrant); (b) "The Fountain" (Rheinberger); and (c) "Sir Knight" (Macirone).

Bawtry (Mr. J. Smith).

2nd. Edwinstowe (Mr. H. Minchin).

Gringley (Mr. G. H. Ellis).

Grove and Headon (Mr. H. C. Andrews).

Leverton (Mr. G. H. Ellis).

1st. Rampton (Mr. H. C. Andrews).

Ranskill (Mr. G. H. Ellis).

Tuxford Choir (Mr. G. H. Ellis).

In the open choral classes the prize-winners were Retford Wesleyan (sight-reading), Retford Congregational (anthem), Retford Amateur Musical Society (female-voice choirs), and Mr. Andrew's Chorus (male-voice choirs). Dvorák's "Slavonic cradle song," Sir Julius Benedict's "Hunting song," and "O the pleasure of the plains," from "Acis and Galatea," formed an admirable test for the chief mixed-voice class. Retford Amateur Musical Society (Mr. J. Smith) was first, Retford and Rampton Choral Societies (Mr. Andrews) second and third. The competition for amateur orchestras drew two entries—Doncaster (Mr. C. Reasbeck) and Retford (Mr. Frederick Dawson); the former, who showed surprising efficiency, was successful. A Doncaster party were unchallenged in a string quartet competition.

Three concerts were given, in which combined choirs took part. The prizes were distributed at the end of the village day by the Duchess of Portland.

BATH (MID-SOMERSET).

April 12, 13, 14.

The organizers of this competition aim at serving the needs of its district with completeness by visiting different towns within the area. Last year the festival was held with success at Frome; this year Bath was chosen, and with equally satisfactory results.

A gratifying feature was the ready support given to the children's competitions. Large entries were received in all the classes for school and other junior choirs, including the sight-singing contests. In the chief class the test was Rubinstein's "Song of the birds." The competing choirs were:

- 3rd. Church of England Girls', Bathwick.
Weymouth House Boys', Bath.
Christ Church Girls', Frome.
Girls' C.S., Frome.
Church of England Girls', Radstock.
St. John the Baptist Girls', Frome.
Widcombe Boys'.
Weymouth House Girls', Bath.
- 2nd. Church of England Boys', Bathwick.
Church of England Boys', Portishead.
Mr. Davis's Boys' Choir.
Clutton C.S.
- 1st. Church of England Boys', Frome.

The competition for children's choirs that had not won a prize in the previous years brought ten entries. The test was "In Mary's garden" (E. M. Boyce).

- Widcombe Boys'.
Church of England Girls', Bathwick.
Mr. Davis's Boys' Choir.
St. John the Baptist Girls', Frome.
Somerset Industrial.
- 2nd. Church of England Boys', Bathwick.
- 1st. Weymouth House Girls', Bath.
Christ Church Girls', Frome.
British School, Oakhill.
Clutton C.S.

In the elementary school choir contests, Church of England Girls', Bathwick, Church of England Boys', Frome, and Clutton C.S. were successful. Prizes for sight-singing were taken by Church of England Boys', Frome, and Somerset Industrial (Staff); Clutton C.S. and Church of England Girls', Radstock (Sol-fa). There were also competitions for small elementary schools, won by Pilton, and for non-elementary schools one entry, Duke Street, Bath; and contests in singing games, won by Pilton and East Harptree.

The combined children's choirs sang under the direction of Mr. Clive Carey at the first concert.

The solo competitions resulted as follows:

- Pianoforte solo.—Miss Imogen Hawkins.
Soprano solo.—Miss Goodrich.
Contralto solo.—Miss Wheeler.
Bass solo.—Rev. R. W. Flex.
Sight-reading.—Mr. W. Stickland.
Mixed-voice quartet.—Rev. G. H. Hooper's Quartet.
Male-voice quartet.—Mr. Odey's Party.

The senior choral competitions were much sub-divided, and except in the male-voice sections well supported. In the chief contest for village choirs the tests were: "Upon my lap my sovereign sits" (Martin Peerson) and "Shall we go dance" (Stanford). Five choirs sang:

- Chewton Mendip and District.
Clutton and District.
- 2nd. Ashwick Choral Society.
Harptree Choral Society.
- 1st. Nunney Delamere Choir.

In the competition for small villages the prize was divided between Lullington and Horsington. A competition for choirs that had not been successful in the two previous years attracted four entries, in spite of the difficulty of the test, which was "Young Herchard" (Boughton):

- 1st. Wadbury Choral Society.
Lullington Choral Society.
- 2nd. Nunney Delamere Choir.
Coleford Choral Society.
Horsington Choral Society.

Other prize-winners were: Midsomer Norton (for madrigal singing); Wadbury and Clutton district (equal in the chief Ladies' Choir contest); and Radstock, who were victorious over the Orpheus Glee Society in the chief male-voice choir contest. The tests in this event were: "The linden blossom" (Moellendorff) and "The riders' song" (Cornelius).

THE CHIEF CHORAL COMPETITION.

- Tests: "Evening has lost her throne" (Bantock); and "To daffodils" (Roger Quilter).
- Ashwick.
2nd. Shepton Mallet.
Chewton Mendip and District.
 - 1st. Midsomer Norton.
Harptree.

The festival came to an end with a grand concert, for which the services of the Pump-room Orchestra, under Mr. Max Heymann, were engaged. Some of the winning choirs sang their test-pieces, and various groups of combined choirs sang: Tchaikovsky's "Hymn to the Trinity," Mendelssohn's "42nd Psalm," Brahms's "The death of Trenchard," Elgar's "Land of hope and glory," and Bridge's "Bold Turpin," under the direction of Dr. McNaught and Mr. Clive Carey. Tchaikovsky's B flat minor Pianoforte Concerto was played with great skill by Mrs. Knatchbull (Dora Bright).

ASHBOURNE (DOVE AND CHURNET VALLEY). April 12.

At this year's competitions there was a satisfactory entry list, and very few instances of a choir failing to put in an appearance. Denstone and Langley House, Ashbourne, were successful in classes for small and large schools respectively; the former class included action-songs. Three competitions for church and chapel choirs were organized, and resulted in prizes being won by Mayfield, Ashbourne Zion Chapel, and (for sight-reading) Denstone. Rocester were the best of five choral societies that were tested in sight-reading. Rocester II. were the best of ten competing quartet parties. No less than eleven female-voice choirs sang Hatton's "The water lily," the first three places being assigned to Mayfield, Ellastone and Ashbourne Cecilia. The Mayfield Male-voice Choir were best and Denstone second-best in singing Dr. Walford Davies's "Hymn before action." One of the most remarkable performances was that of the Denstone children in an action song, "Dancing leaves," under Mrs. Wrothesley. It was most charmingly sung and acted. A full description of the actions is given in this month's SCHOOL MUSIC REVIEW. The two competitions for mixed-voice choirs resulted as follows:

CHOIRS OF LESS THAN FORTY VOICES.

- Test: "Thy voice, O harmony" (Webbe).
2nd. Checkley.
Clifton.
Sudbury.
Snellston.
1st. Denstone.
3rd. Ellastone.

CHOIRS OF OVER FORTY VOICES. (Challenge Cup Competition.)

- Test: "Song of the silent land" (West).
1st. Rocester.
2nd. Mayfield.
Cheadle.
Tean.

Mr. T. Tertius Noble and Dr. McNaught adjudicated, working separately in different halls.

Lady Duncombe, of Calwich Abbey, is one of the most enthusiastic promoters of this enterprise. It was fortunate that it was possible to secure Denstone College. Large audiences crowded the two halls all day.

FARNHAM. April 13.

It is much to be regretted that the children's competitions, which had to be left out of last year's festival owing to an epidemic, are now permanently abandoned owing to an action on the part of the Education Committee. The adult competitions were carried out successfully with Dr. Walford Davies as adjudicator. Aldershot G.F.S. (Miss Renison), Kingsley Female-voice and Male-voice Choirs, Farnborough Male-voice Choir, and Tilford Choral Society (Mr. G. W. T. Lonsdale) were successful in different classes. Four choirs—Farnham, Alton, Crondall and Farnborough—entered for the chief choral competition, for which the tests were "He that shall endure" (Mendelssohn) and a part-song, "A song for the seasons" (Smart). Alton were the winners, and a special prize was given to Farnborough for their singing of the part-song, which was the best performance in the competition. Prizes for sight-singing were taken by Tilford, Farnham and Alton. A contest between the Farnham Orchestral (Mr. Morton Latham) and Instrumental (Mr. Percy R. Rowe) Societies resulted in a tie.

ILKLEY (WHARFEDALE).

April 14, 15, 16.

This festival, though inaugurated as recently as 1907, has attained such dimensions that it can boast an entry list of over 1,000, a fact which speaks well for the musical vitality of the district and for the ability of the organizers of the competition. The adjudicator was Dr. Somervell, who made his awards in the chief events as follows:

LOCAL COMPETITIONS.

Pianoforte solos.—Miss Marcia Mowat, Miss Margaret Akeroyd.
Violin solo.—Miss Caroline Ainger.
Girls' solo singing.—Miss Doris Kershaw.
Boys' solo singing.—Howard Crawshaw.
Children's solo sight-reading.—Marjorie Swales.
Soprano solo.—Miss May Town.
Contralto solo.—Miss Alice Barrett.
Tenor solo.—Mr. Joseph Stoddard.
Bass solo.—Mr. Harold Brearley.
Girls' clubs.—Ilkley, St. Margaret's Hall (Mr. A. T. Akeroyd).
Only one entry was received in each of the classes for elementary school choirs—Grassington Church School (small villages) and Ilkley National Girls' (larger villages).

OPEN COMPETITIONS.

Boys' solo.—George Jowett.
Pianoforte solo.—Miss Ida Bellerby.
Soprano solo.—Mrs. Rowland White.
Baritone solo.—Mr. Arthur Burnell.
Bass solo.—Mr. Herbert Lord.
Mixed-voice quartet.—Brighouse Excelsior.
Church and Chapel choirs.—Bingley P.M. (Mr. W. Robertson).

CHORAL SOCIETIES (village).

Tests: "Valentine's song" (Stanford) and "Song of the pedlar" (Lee Williams).

1st. Ilkley St. Cecilia (Mr. A. T. Akeroyd).
Pool Choral Union (Mr. E. A. Midgley).
Burley-in-Wharfedale (Mr. F. J. P. Drake).

FEMALE-VOICE CHOIRS.

Tests: "Lullaby" (Cyril Rootham) and "The Spanish gipsy girl" (Lassen).
1st. Pool Choral Union.
2nd. Burley Choral Society.

MALE-VOICE CHOIRS.

Tests: "Bright through the window" (Max Reger) and "The reveille" (Elgar).
1st. Nelson Arrian Glee Union (Mr. Lawson Berry).
2nd. Todmorden (Mr. Harold Lees).
Ilkley Orpheus (Mr. E. A. Earnshaw).

MIXED-VOICE CHOIRS.

Tests: "When flowery meadows" (Palestrina) and "A ballad" (Theo. Wendt).
1st. Ilkley St. Cecilia (Mr. A. T. Akeroyd).
2nd. Thornton Vocal Union (Mr. W. Lloyd Ashton).
Burley-in-Wharfedale (Mr. F. J. P. Drake).

MORPETH (WANSBECK).

April 15, 16.

These competitions maintained their popularity, and the singing, especially in the senior events, drew forth the highest praise from the adjudicator, Mr. Harry Evans.

Five choirs sang in the competition for small schools, Rothbury (Mr. Johnson) being winners. In the class for large schools Morpeth Corporation Girls' (Miss Foster) were successful. A challenge cup for choirs of singers under sixteen years of age, not necessarily from schools, was won by Pegswood (Mr. F. Alvey) by a small margin over Hartburn and Netherwitton. In sight-singing Bedlington School (Mr. J. Moralee) were winners in the Sol-fa division; in the Staff division there were no entries. Out of five action-songs that of Morpeth Corporation Girls' was the best. The children's day terminated with a performance by combined choirs of "The Golden Vanity" and Myles B. Foster's "To sea," under the direction of Mr. Harry Evans.

In the senior competitions Netherwitton (Lt.-Col. Orde) and Bedlington Station P.M. (Mr. J. Moralee) were successful among the church choirs. One "novice" village choir—Belsay (Mrs. Hugh Middleton)—entered in a special class for such bodies, and one "small male-voice choir"—Felton (Mr. Phillips)—came forward. In the other class for village choral societies, in which the test was "The maiden of the Fleur-de-lis," the entries and results were as follows:

Longframlington.
2nd. Netherwitton.
1st. Felton.
Belsay.

For female-voice choirs the test was "Pealing chimes" (Balfe), and Netherwitton were victorious. In a competition for choral societies from large villages in the district, the tests were: "Gather ye rosebuds" (Rathbone) and "Diaphenia" (Stanford). Entries and results:

Bedlington Co-operative.
2nd. Netherwitton.
Broomhill Co-operative.
1st. Felton.
Longframlington.

Two "large male-voice choirs" came forward to sing Bantock's "Boot and saddle" and Sullivan's "The long day closes"; Morpeth Y.M.C.A. (Mr. Arthur Platts) were successful over Ashington Harmonic (Mr. J. R. Liddell). Morpeth Philharmonic (Mr. Platts) were unchallenged in the open class for choral societies; the tests were: "Sweet honey-sucking bees" (Wilbye) and "Music when soft voices die" (Parry). At the end of the proceedings all the choirs combined to sing Schubert's "God in the thunderstorm" and Elgar's arrangement of "God save the King," under the baton of Mr. Evans.

GIRLS' CLUBS.

April 16.

The twenty-third annual singing competition of the London Working Girls' Club Union was held with success in the City of London Schools. Each competing choir was made to undergo a sight-test in addition to singing the prescribed piece. The entries in the two classes and the marks obtained by the first three choirs are given below. The maximum marks obtainable were (a) for the test-piece, 80; (b) for the sight-singing, 40.

CLASS I. (Senior).

Tests: "Hail, Judea, happy land" (Handel); and "Come, sisters, come" (MacKenzie).

of which the second was chosen by the adjudicator for competition.

		Marks		(a)	(b)	Total.

(b) Total.	70	37	107	66	35	101	72	38	110

The combined choirs in Class I. sang their two test-pieces under the direction of Dr. Huntley. Dr. McNaught was the adjudicator.

MANCHESTER.

CLARION VOCAL UNION.

April 16.

The twelfth annual festival and choral contest of the Clarion Vocal Union was this year held for the fourth time in Manchester. The Union has now grown so large that it has become necessary to hold preliminary contests in the counties of Lancashire and Yorkshire, to reduce the number of competing choirs to six or seven.

The test was "Spring is cheery, winter is weary" (Holbrooke). The following choirs belonging to the Clarion Vocal Union entered:

Halifax (Mr. R. Crowther).
Oldham (Mr. H. W. Chadderton).
Bradford (Mr. M. Conway).
3rd. Sheffield (Mr. G. Norman).
Burnley (Mr. F. Brunton).
1st. Newcastle (Mr. J. L. Ritchie).
2nd. Manchester (Mr. T. Corlett).

Dr. Thomas Keighley adjudicated. The festival terminated with a concert, in which the combined choirs took part.

SEND OUT THY LIGHT.

First system of the musical score. It consists of five staves. The top four staves are vocal parts (Soprano, Alto, Tenor, Bass) and the bottom staff is the piano accompaniment. The lyrics are: "God! On the harp, O our God! On the harp, O our God! Send out Thy". The music features a key signature of one flat (B-flat) and a 4/4 time signature. Dynamics include ff (fortissimo) and pp (pianissimo).

Second system of the musical score. It consists of five staves. The lyrics are: "light and Thy truth, let them lead me, And let them bring me to Thy ho - ly". The music continues with the same vocal and piano parts. Dynamics include cres. (crescendo), dim. (diminuendo), and ff (fortissimo).

Third system of the musical score. It consists of five staves. The lyrics are: "hill, . . . Send out Thy light and Thy truth, let them lead me, And let them". The music concludes with the same vocal and piano parts. Dynamics include p (piano), cres. (crescendo), f (forte), and rit. (ritardando).

As its name implies, this book is designed for use with, and not in place of, other Church Hymnals.For this reason the Hymns are numbered from 301, so that the numbers may not interfere with the use of any other hymn book, no other Church hymn book having as many as even seven hundred hymns. Each hymn has its own distinctive tune, and no hymn or tune in this work is found in Hymns Ancient and Modern (Old Edition), so that with the two books no duplication occurs.

ANTONIO STRADIVARI

HIS LIFE AND WORK (1644-1737)

BY

W. Henry Hill, Arthur F. Hill, F.S.A.,
and Alfred E. Hill.

A NEW AND CHEAPER EDITION.

This Book contains the whole of the original text and most of the illustrations, with the difference that the coloured plates have been replaced by photographic reproductions. On the other hand, however, it includes an additional illustration in colours, by way of frontispiece, of the celebrated Stradivari Violin, known as "The Messie."

In reviewing the earlier edition, The Times said: "That the authors were well qualified for the task is plain. They belong to a family in which violin making has been traditional for generations, they have been aided by the family lore and guided by wide and varied experience. Thus equipped, they have devoted themselves to a careful examination and comparison of the great maker's instruments, and the list cited justifies the conclusion that there can be few which have escaped their notice. The same journal refers to the book as "the most important contribution yet made to the history of the great fiddle-maker and his work."

BRAIN TO KEYBOARD.

VALUE OF THE COURSE.

A Mus. BAC. writes: "I would not be without your exercises for ten times the fee."

Another Mus. BAC. says: "I am fully satisfied that I have never spent three guineas to greater advantage in all my musical life."

OTHER PUPILS say:

"The £3 3s. is the best outlay I have ever made in my efforts to learn the piano."

"Your course is worth far more than a great many 'quarters' of lessons—in the ordinary sense of the word—put together."

"I consider your lessons a splendid return for the money."

"I would have spent three times as much by the ordinary methods to have obtained the same execution, not to mention the great saving in time."

"I have never spent three guineas to better purpose in my life."

Playing for Pleasure.

However good your technique and power of execution, you cannot derive pleasure from your pianoforte playing unless you can read music as readily and easily as reading a book. Playing pieces which you have had to study and learn can give only a very limited enjoyment. It is not difficult to acquire the ability to play even the most advanced music at first sight; but you can only do so by the aid of my System of Pianoforte Sight-Playing. By any other means you will have to give years of practising for many hours daily, while my system involves little more than 15 minutes' daily practising for three months. The results are certain. Provided that you have the necessary finger dexterity, no piece, however advanced, will be too difficult to play at first sight. With students less advanced the results are proportionately great.

FEE FOR COMPLETE CORRESPONDENCE COURSE, £3 3s.

My Booklet describes the principles and methods of the System. Sent free to any Pianist on application to

AND SINGING-CLASS CIRCULAR.

JUNE 1, 1910.

KING EDWARD THE SEVENTH.

BORN, NOVEMBER 9, 1841.

PROCLAIMED KING, JANUARY 23, 1901.

DIED, MAY 6, 1910.

The death of King Edward the Seventh, on May 6, 1910, after a short illness, profoundly stirred the whole nation. The deep attachment of all classes of the community to his late Majesty was one of the most striking things in our history and a just pride to every patriot. At his death every man and woman throughout the length and breadth of the Empire felt the pang of a personal loss. The singular attributes of the late Monarch, and the commanding position he attained in the world's counsels, have since been recorded by many eloquent writers and orators, and foreign nations have also paid their willing tribute of respect and regard for his memory. He strove for 'Peace on earth and goodwill towards men,' and he has earned in history the glorious title, King Edward the Peacemaker.

In the Musical Times we naturally dwell more particularly upon King Edward's attitude to music than on his splendid achievements in great matters of State. We have to record our thankfulness that a man in his late Majesty's exalted position, weighted as he was by innumerable duties and heavy responsibilities, was yet able to devote so much of his time and thought to the advancement of musical art in this country. As Prince of Wales he saw clearly that if this country was to enter into its musical inheritance, it must be provided not merely with highly patronised concerts and operas with foreigners as chief performers, but that we must set to work to create composers and executants from our own stock. He saw also the great value of music as a binding social force that made for happiness and content. With these convictions he threw himself heart and soul into the movement which culminated in the establishment of the Royal College of Music.

The history of that movement cannot be traced here, but it will be interesting just now to recall some passages from a long speech His Royal Highness made on the occasion of the opening of the Royal College on May 7, 1883. He said:

'The establishment of an institution such as I open to-day is not the mere creation of a new musical society. The time has come when class can no longer stand aloof from class, and that man does his duty best who works most earnestly in bridging over the gulf between different classes which it is the tendency of increased wealth and increased civilization to widen. I claim for music the merit that it has a voice which speaks in different tones, perhaps, but with equal force to the cultivated and the ignorant, to the peer and the peasant. I claim for music a variety of expression which belongs to no other art, and therefore adapts it more than any other art to produce that union of feeling which I much desire to promote. Lastly, I claim for music the distinction which is awarded to it by Addison—that it is the only sensual pleasure in which excess cannot be injurious. What more, gentlemen, can I say on behalf of the art for the promotion of which we are to-day opening this institution—an institution which, I trust, will give to music a new impulse, a glorious future and a national life.'

The interest of the Prince of Wales in the Royal College did not hide from him the great work accomplished by the old-established and flourishing sister institution, the Royal Academy of Music. At an Academy prize distribution by her then Royal Highness the Princess of Wales at St. James's Hall, on July 22, 1897, His Royal Highness said:

'My Lord, Ladies and Gentlemen, I am desirous, in the name of the Princess, and of my own, to thank Lord Herschell and Mr. Threlfall for the very kind terms in which they have, respectively, proposed and seconded this vote of thanks, and you also for the very kind way in which it has been received. The Princess also desires me to express to everybody here present, and especially to the pupils who I see before me, the satisfaction it has given her personally to present the awards and prizes of this year. You have heard an excellent address from the Principal of the Royal Academy of Music, Sir Alexander Mackenzie, and I am sure it will be gratifying to all those who take not only an interest in this Institution, but in music generally, to hear so satisfactory an account of the prosperity of the Institution. Not only is it satisfactory from the pecuniary point of view, for I think, after the admirable vocal and instrumental, though short, concert we have heard to-day, we have every reason to say how very efficient the pupils are, how carefully taught they are, and what pains they take in acquiring the science and art which, I think, is one of those which in every country is becoming more and more appreciated. You are well aware of the deep interest the Princess takes in everything connected with the science and art of music in all its branches, and I share the same feeling. I stand here to-day in a peculiar position, as I have the honour to be President of the Royal College of Music. I regard that Institution as the younger sister of the one we are meeting in connection with to-day. We may have rivalry, but I am sure it is only friendly rivalry, and that our only desire and wish is to merit the approbation of the country as your Institution does. We have only one object in view, and that is to promote the science and art of music in all its branches. Now, in the name of the Princess and myself, I repeat that it has given us much pleasure to take part in to-day's interesting ceremony.'

It is worthy of special note that in 1890, when the Associated Board of the Royal Academy and the Royal College was formed, His Majesty (then Prince of Wales) was the first President.

The interest of the late King in grand opera was manifested by his frequent attendance at Covent Garden. He attended the first performance of 'Elektra' (Strauss), when it was given, on February 19, in the recent Beecham Opera season. His Majesty, whilst he was Prince of Wales, was an active supporter of the Royal Amateur Orchestral Society. On concert nights he would invite well-known members of the musical and other professions to dine at Marlborough House, and afterwards the whole party would attend the concert. This genial practice was also followed by the Prince of Wales, now King George, who has long shown interest in musical progress, and obviously has realised the unique importance the art has attained in the development of civilization.

Deep sympathy with Queen Alexandra and all the Royal Family has found universal expression and touching recognition. The nation is solaced by the feeling that King George and Queen Mary will be found responsive to the demands of the great position they have inherited.

some degree the desires of Royal personages. It is sometimes said that these programmes do not adequately represent British composers. As a matter of fact, an analysis of numerous programmes performed at Court functions during the late King's reign, shows that the compositions of British composers figure in a greater proportion than they do, say, at Queen's Hall concerts or at students' concerts at the Royal Academy and the Royal College, where it might be supposed the interests of British composers would be specially considered.

At thirty concerts given at Buckingham Palace during the reign of King Edward, 197 orchestral and 14 vocal pieces were performed, under the direction of Sir Walter Parratt, the Master of the King's Music. Of the former, forty-six, and of the latter, seven, were by British composers; roughly a quarter of the whole number.

WOMEN AND MUSIC.

BY ERNEST NEWMAN.

If I were to say that no scavenger has ever flown in an aeroplane, and that this proves conclusively that no scavenger will ever be able to do so, a hundred people would at once point out that the only sufficient reason for the phenomenon not having happened yet is that the cost of an aeroplane is at present beyond the scavenger's means; but that if ever the price of aeroplanes fell to the level of a scavenger's wages, or the scavenger's wages rose to the level of aeroplane prices, we should have quite a number of these people taking to aviation. The bar, I should be told, is purely economic; there is nothing in the constitution of the scavenger, quâ scavenger, that unfits, has always unfitted, and will perpetually unfit him to control an aeroplane. Yet many people who would cry derision on an argument of the kind here supposed will accept contentedly the equally absurd argument that because women have not done any great creative work in music in the past they will never do it in the future. They do, it is true, try to give a semblance of science to the wild deduction. One of them will point to the differences, or supposed differences, between the brains of men and those of women—as if any of us knew what it was in the brain, or out of it, that made genius! Another will tell women, kindly but firmly, as befits one of the superior sex, that she is much too excitable to have the necessary control over her ideas and emotions that highly original work in art or science requires. This is practically Mr. Upton's thesis in his entertaining, rather than convincing, little book on 'Women and Music.' This theory conveniently ignores the fact that hundreds of thousands of women are superior to the average man in bodily and mental health and in self-control, and that many masculine geniuses have been weaklings, invalids, or unmistakably unbalanced, if not, at times, actually insane. We have the spectacle, for example, of Herbert Spencer solemnly using the early death of Miss Constance Naden as a warning to women against profound and prolonged scientific study, while he himself was a chronic valetudinarian, compelled to restrict his hours of mental labour, and only able to carry on his work by means of private funds that spared him the necessity of fighting the battle of life at the same time that he pursued his literary recreations, as so many women have to do. Then again there is the investigator like Mr. J. Donovan, who, in his 'Music and Action,' decides that musical creation is the product of a certain 'active,' i.e., masculine, psychological state, and that women being 'passive,' musical creation is, of course, beyond them; which looks rather like saying that men are creators because they are men, and women cannot be creators because they are not men! The notorious failure of any and every scavenger to fly from London to Manchester in an aeroplane is apparently due to the fact that to control the motor and the planes of the machine a certain psychological state is necessary, which state, by a wise provision of nature, has been limited to men of leisure with an income, say, of not less than £500 a year!

Nature, however, with all her faults, is not so fantastic as this; and she would probably be greatly surprised and amused if she could learn how men use her name to cover their own failures in reasoning or research. The progress of women in other departments of thought and work that were once held to belong exclusively to men, must make us doubt whether there is anything in their physical or mental structure that will perpetually prevent the sex from producing a great composer. There was a time, for example, when women were not allowed to perform on the English stage, the female parts in plays being taken by boys. When the women began to act, in the 17th century, the pure and noble soul of man was of course revolted, as it always is when women do something that he makes no scruple of doing himself. We know that the first actresses were insulted, and we may be sure that amateur psychologists and sociologists proved daily, to their own satisfaction, that women would never produce a great actress because they never had produced one. Yet to-day the best actors are no better than the best actresses. It is a far cry, again, from the novels of Mlle. de Scudéry to those of the brilliant and thoughtful women novelists of the last fifty years, or from the dramas and poetry of Hannah More, Joanna Baillie and Mrs. Hemans to those of the women of to-day. We may at least hope, then, that as more and more women find it possible to express the music that is born in them, the standard of their creative work will rise as it has done in the other arts. But till social and economic conditions enable women to make composition their life-work, as men can do, it is idle to dogmatise upon what the natural limitations of the feminine brain may or may not be.

No one who looks into the matter can doubt that women, until quite lately, have not had the same social and economic advantages in the study of art that men have had. They have found difficulty, in some countries, in being admitted into conservatoires. In 1856, Miss Elizabeth Stirling was refused the degree of Mus. Bac. at Oxford, not because her composition was not good enough, but because the statutes did not authorise the conferring of the degree on a woman. Even to-day the more successful of them are handicapped in a way that men are not. Many publishers look askance at women's scores, so that the composers have either to adopt masculine pseudonyms or to dupe the publishers or the public by suppressing their Christian names—Miss Ethel Smyth's Mass, for example, having to bear on its title-page simply 'by E. M. Smyth.' But the worst obstacle to them has been the fact that women composers have been drawn from a much more limited field than men composers. Suppose, for instance, that in the 18th century the daughter of humble parents had been born with a real gift for composition. What earthly chance would it have had to develop? How many fathers, even supposing they had the means, would spend money on the education of the girl in the technique of composition? Even supposing the paternal sympathy to be there, how many poor men could afford to deny themselves the profit of their daughter's labour in order to keep her at home studying counterpoint? And how many girls of this class, even if by some good fortune they could have gained all the necessary knowledge, could afterwards find the leisure to apply it? Economic necessities would drive them into either marriage or work of some kind that would make the steady pursuit of musical composition impossible. The result of the constant pressure of all these forces would be to restrict the necessary education to (1) young ladies of wealth and position—as is shown by the large number of titled female composers; (2) the daughters of musicians. Let me show how these forces have worked in the parallel case of painting, where the documentary evidence is rather fuller. There have been many hundreds of female artists during the last three centuries, but, until quite lately, they almost invariably belonged to artist families; if their father was not an artist, as was the case with perhaps nine out of ten, they married a painter. An examination of the parentage of the women artists whose biographies are given in Miss E. C. Clayton's 'English Female Artists' will prove this conclusively; Miss Clayton, indeed, remarks that 'as we pass down the fair ranks of the earlier female artists, we shall find that they almost invariably follow in the footsteps of a brother or a father. In the case of English women there is scarcely an instance to the contrary, the reason being, in all likelihood, the impossibility of studying under other instruction until these more pleasant later days.' Léonce Bénédite, in an article on 'Women Painters in France' (in the volume on 'Women Painters of the World' that Mr. Walter Shaw Sparrow brought out a few years ago), shows the same conditions to have ruled in France: 'the women artists, with very rare exceptions, all belonged to artist families.' As far as my research has gone, the same principle holds good in other countries. This means that the world has mostly been dependent for its women painters upon the daughters of artists. It is the rarest exception, however, for male painters or sculptors to have come from artist families. Let us take a number of representative names. Correggio's father was a merchant; Giotto's, a peasant; Ford Madox Brown's, a naval officer; Bartolozzi's, a goldsmith; Sodoma's, a shoemaker; Jacopo Bellini's, a tinsmith; Ghirlandajo's, a goldsmith and broker; Boucher's, a pattern designer; Michelangelo's, a magistrate; Callot's, a herald-at-arms; Constable's, a miller; Corot's, a poor man, not a painter; Millais's, a well-to-do man, not a painter; Holman Hunt's, a business man; Miller's, a peasant; Velasquez's, a man of good family, not a painter; Van Dyck's, a silk mercer; Rembrandt's, a miller; Leonardo da Vinci's, a notary;

Botticelli's, a tanner; Dürer's, a goldsmith; Gainsborough's, a clothier; Claude Lorraine's, a poor man, not a painter; Giorgione's, a peasant; Goya's, a cottager; Holbein's, a leather maker; Hogarth's, a schoolmaster; Lancret's, a shoemaker; Murillo's, a mechanic; Pater's, a wood-carver; Puvis de Chavannes's, an engineer; Reynolds's, a clergyman; Tintoretto's, a dyer; Romney's, a cabinet maker; Rubens's, a lawyer; Titian's, a well-to-do patrician; Turner's, a barber; Watteau's, a plumber; Watts's, a military engineer; Wilkie's, a clergyman; Rossetti's, a man of letters. That is to say, male artistic aptitude comes from aptitude of the same kind in the father in perhaps one case in a hundred; so that if we had had to rely solely or mainly upon the sons of painters for our art, we should have lost ninety-nine per cent. of the greatest artists. Yet when we are restricted practically to the daughters of painters for our women artists, we can see no reason for the non-appearance of geniuses among them every year or so but that woman, quæ woman, is incapable of great creative work! Ruskin, for example, dogmatically declared that 'no woman can paint,' a statement he had the grace to withdraw after seeing a picture by Lady Butler—perhaps not the best example of a woman's painting that he could have found had he cared to look further.

In the case of women musicians, it is much harder to trace the father's profession; but an examination of the scanty records of their lives will show clearly that the field of musical composition has been confined mainly to (1) rich or titled women, (2) daughters of musicians, and, in modern times, (3) daughters of well-to-do people who have been willing to give their girls the opportunity for study. (I think we may take it that when we read of an English woman composer having studied in London and Berlin and Rome and a few other places, it argues at any rate comfortable means and some breadth of culture in her parents.) So that once more the field of selection is narrowed to (1) a particular section of society, possessing a certain economic independence, (2) the families of professional musicians. But in both these groups much of the composing is done by women who are primarily pianists or singers or violinists, and whose gift for composition is no more than that of any ordinarily good musician. As the same group among the men does not produce original work of any great value, we must not expect too much from the women. Great creative work can come only from those who have a call to it, not from those in whom it is a mere by-product. We must remember, again, that the thorough study of music—the kind of study that fits one for composition as apart from performance—has only been possible to women in large numbers, drawn from all classes of society, during the last generation or so. Previously to that we shall find that women composers were frequently the daughters of professional musicians, as women painters were the daughters of artists. Here again the field was too limited to produce a large crop. Just as only a small fraction of the great painters were the sons of painters, only a small fraction of the great composers were sons of composers, or of musicians of any kind. I need not here go into details: anyone with a biographical dictionary of musicians can verify the fact for himself. If the world's supply of great composers, then, had depended upon the genius of the sons of composers, or even the sons of musicians in general, we should have been very poorly off. The same phenomenon is observable in science, Galton ('Hereditary Genius,' p. 190) admitting that 'the fathers of the ablest men in science have frequently been unscientific.' Is it not, then, a little unfair to women to expect them to put forward a high proportion of feminine genius under conditions that would be fatal to the emergence of much masculine genius?

If space permitted, the problem could be followed up along another line,—that of economics. The histories of art and literature and science show how dependent we have been for the greater part of our best work during the last 2,500 years upon the chance of genius happening to coincide in the same individual with (1) inherited income, or (2) the favour of a patron, or (3) the possession of an official or academic post, or (4) a business that provided means and leisure, or (5) some similar economic surety. In art, good work can now and then be done, for a short time, under conditions of poverty, but not often, and not for long. A composer must either live by his work, or have some other means of livelihood that will leave him free to compose. Most of them have either had to support themselves during their earlier years of work by undertaking some official duties, or by the funds of a patron. No such opportunities were open to women. What aristocratic patron ever did for women what was done for Gluck, Beethoven and others? What friend, or group of friends, ever drew upon his or their purse to provide a woman with leisure for composition, as was done for Wagner and Wolf? What posts were open to women? They could not be organists, like Bach and César Franck, nor opera conductors, like Wagner (in his earlier days) and Weber, nor directors of a nobleman's music, like Haydn. They could not even live a Bohemian life, like Schubert. A man may be poor and awkward and still be received in good artistic society; but a woman who was as poor as Schubert, and lived his kind of life, would be cold-shouldered everywhere. Again let us ask ourselves how much male genius in music would have come to maturity had all these avenues been closed to it? And even if, by some miracle, a woman had come to the front in spite of all these obstacles, would she then have had the same advantages as a man in attaining publicity? By no means. Men have been as reluctant to perform a woman's music as to publish it. Carlotta Ferrari (b. 1837) found that no impresario would produce her opera 'Ugo' (1857), simply because she was a woman. She finally had to bear the cost of production at Milan herself. The opera, we read, "achieved a complete success, and from that moment the theatrical directors contended with each other to secure her works.' Well and good, as it happened; but how many women can afford to pay for performances of an opera, in the hope that a success may be won and the doors henceforth flung open to them?

All things considered, then, the wonder is not that women should have produced so few good composers, but that they should have produced any, hampered as they have been in their musical education, in the means of supporting themselves during their early years, and in gaining a public hearing. Women have done excellent work in literature and acting during the past two centuries—work quite equal to that of men in several departments. Why is this? Because here natural aptitude—observation, thought, expression—can find an outlet without the necessity for a long course of technical study, which calls for sympathy from parents and considerable expenditure. Moreover, the author and the actor have more chances of appealing directly to the public than the composer has. The field of selection thus being a large one, hundreds of women of ability come to the front. Is there any reason to doubt that had the field of selection in music for the last century or two been equally large, instead of being limited in the various ways I have pointed out, the level of composition among women would have been higher? At all events, until women composers have had the opportunity of working for a few generations under the same social and economic conditions as men composers, and have then failed to produce a work of unmistakable genius, it is surely the most superficial dogmatism to say that they have no creative gift merely because they are women.

DR. ARNE'S MASSES.

By WM. BARCLAY SQUIRE.

In the issue of the Musical Times for April, there appeared a short letter from Dr. W. H. Grattan Flood, drawing attention to 'the hitherto unnoticed fact' that Dr. Arne 'was organist of the Sardinian Embassy Chapel, in Duke Street, Lincoln's Inn Fields, and composed two Masses, one for three voices and the other for four voices, for this chapel.' As to Arne's having been organist at the Sardinian Chapel, the information has, indeed, been hitherto unnoticed, and so far as I know it now appears for the first time, but with regard to the Masses this is not the case, for so long ago as the year 1819, Charles Butler wrote (in vol. ii. of the first edition of his 'Historical Memoirs respecting the English . . . Catholics,' &c.) that 'Doctor Arne, the greatest of English musicians, (at least, if we except Purcell), was a roman-catholic . . . He composed for the choir of the Sardinian ambassador, two masses,—one in four, and the other in three parts; the latter did not please. The former was exquisite; it is, what all church music should be, solemn and impressive; the harmony correct and simple; the melody slow and graceful. Unfortunately the thinness of the catholic choirs, in those times, made them drop the contra-tenor and tenor parts, and sing only the canto and base. This entirely spoils the beauty of the composition.' This account of Butler's has been more than once copied or borrowed from, but Dr. Grattan Flood has done well to revive it, on the chance that it may lead to the recovery of Arne's Masses. Some years ago, before the old Sardinian chapel was pulled down, I inquired whether the Masses were to be found there, but my letter met with no reply; and now I am informed that there is no trace of the lost works.

But though, for the present, the Masses seem to have vanished, I am able to give some information with regard to them, and to Arne's position among Catholics in his later years, which I hope will not be without interest.

By way of introduction it should be known that in the latter part of the 18th century there lived a certain William Mawhood, who was a flourishing woollen merchant and army clothier, having his place of business in the old house in West Smithfield in which the gateway of St. Bartholomew's church is embedded, while his private house was at Finchley. Mr. Mawhood was a devout Catholic and an enthusiastic amateur organist and musician. From the middle of 1764 until the end of 1790 he kept a careful diary of his doings: in 1790 he became paralyzed, and seven years later he died and was buried in the churchyard of St. Bartholomew's. By a piece of good fortune his diary, contained in forty-nine thin volumes, has been preserved, and now belongs to the descendant of one of his daughters, who has most kindly allowed me to examine it and to extract the particulars I am about to give. The diary for the most part consists of short records of the movements of the author and his family, in which business entries are mingled with intimate personal details. Every Sunday, Mr. Mawhood and his family came to London to hear Mass either at the Sardinian, the Bavarian, or the Neapolitan Chapel, where he seems often to have acted as organist, or to have taken part as vocalist. He was a regular attendant at the meetings of the Madrigal Society, and Dr. Cummings informs me that the Records of the Society show that on October 30, 1765, on his proposal, Dr. Arne was elected a performing member. Mr. Mawhood owned at least one organ, and his diary contains many entries of dealings with Byfield, the organ-builder, while records of 'tuning the harpsichord' are of constant occurrence. As his family grew up, he took them to St. Omer to be educated, and here he seems to have constantly played the organ at services in every church in the town. He seems to have been on terms of intimacy with Arne and his son Michael, with the Paxton family, and with the elder Webbe—all men who belonged to the little group of Catholic musicians in London in the 18th century.

From a number of extracts I have made from the diary the following selection, printed in the original quaint spelling, may be found interesting:

1767. 4 Feb. Calld on Dr. Arne and Michl. Arne. Was[at] ye Madrigal.
 4 April. Was at Mrs. Arne's and Mr. Pemberton's Benefit: took 3 Pit Tickets at 3/ each.
 9 May. Was at Dr. Arne's with Mr. Rackett and heard ye Catches performd.
 29 Dec. Performd Dr. Arne's Mass at Church.
 1769. 23 Feb. Miss Lucy Magdalene playd ye organ for George Paxton.
 24 March. Paid Aycott in full for... Dr. Arne's Service.
 26 March. Performd the Dr. Arne's Service.
 1770. 29 March. Was at ye Oratorio with Webbe and Pemberton, and performd Dr. Arne's Service at ye Bavarian Chapel.
 13 June. Calld on Dr. Arne who will compose some Musick for Mr. Pemberton's Diurge.
 14 June. Came to town, performd Dr. Arne's Old Service.
 15 June. Was at Dr. Arne's to get a Service for Pemberton.
 20 June. Calld on Dr. Arne about the Service for Pemberton.
 23 June. Calld on Dr. Arne had a small practice of the Service for Mr. Pemberton.
 24 June. Came from Finchly. Dr. Arne Miss Weeller and Master Brown dind with us, after Tea went for Town; rehearsd Webbe's and his Service for my poor freind F. Pemberton.
 27 June. Came to Town, attendd the Practice at Dr. Arne's.
 28 June. Was at Church, performd Dr. Arne, and Webb[e]'s Burial for my poor freind Francis Pemberton.
 1771. 4th Nov. Came to Town... St Charles Boromeus, performd the Dr.'s Service.
 Xmas Day. Was at Lincolns inn fields, performd Mr. Paxton's Service.
 29 Dec. Performd Dr. Arne's Service.
 1772. 8 June. All went to Lincoln inn fields: performd a new Service of Mr. Webb's.
 24 Dec. Mett Mr. Michl Arne.
 1773. 1 Jan. At Lincolns inn field performd ye Dr. old Service.
 3 Jan. All at Lincolns Inn Fields, performd Dr. Arne's new Service.
 10 Jan. Self Maria and Bett at Vespres; brot George ye Organist home, he playd and supped.
 13 April. All at Lincolns-inn fields; performd Dr. Arne's Service.
 1775. 25 March. All at L. F.; did not play ye Organ having had words with George P.
 25 Oct. Mr. Paxton call'd, says his Nephew George was drown'd this morn. or last night from a Warf, Black Fryers bridge.
 26 Oct. Mr. Webbe call'd, says he has spoke to Mr. Brown and got ye place if the Embassador does not put in another.
 1776. 19 May. All at L. F.; See Dr. Arne there; desired I wd get Michl Arne a protection from ye Embasador.
 13 Dec. All at the Bavarian; a Grand Service for the Publick fast. See Mr. Webbe and Paxton; are to reconcile matters at L. F.
 25 Dec. All at High [Mass] at L. F. Mr. Paxtons performing his Service self did no[t] play.
 1777. 6 Dec. See Dr. Arne, who has conformd and is now very ill, has made his will betwixt Mrs. Arne and Michl.
 10 Dec. Mr. Paxton call'd, says Dr. Arne is now on the recovery.
 1778. 5 March. Dr. Arne died this even: 8 o'clock.
 5 May. Mr. Burgiss sacerdos drank Tea, lent him Arne's Service in F.

The above entries supply a certain amount of rather interesting information. They show that Arne's two Masses, one of which was in F, were written before 1773, that they were constantly performed, and that more than one copy of them existed, so that it may be hoped that they have not entirely disappeared. The 'Musick for Mr. Pemberton's Dirge,' to which so many entries in the diary for 1770 refer, fortunately has been preserved in a manuscript volume left to the British Museum by Vincent Novello. It consists of the Response from the Office of the Burial of the Dead, beginning 'Libera me, Domine,' set for five-part chorus and treble, tenor and bass solos, with organ accompaniment (partly wanting); the manuscript is headed 'Libera. Del Sig.^r Arne 1770,' but until the discovery of the entries in Mr. Mawhood's diary nothing was known as to its history. As music it is not very remarkable, and it is far inferior to the singularly severe 'O Salutaris' for four voices (unaccompanied), which is the only other fragment of the composer's Latin church music preserved in the Museum manuscripts.

Another fact revealed by the Mawhood diary is that the organist of the Sardinian Chapel for some time prior to 1776 was George Paxton, a nephew of Stephen Paxton, the violoncellist and composer, and that he was probably succeeded by the elder Webbe. But the most interesting entry is that of December 6, 1777, stating that Dr. Arne had 'conformed,' i.e., left the Church of Rome for that of England. This has hitherto, so far as I am aware, been unknown, and Mr. Mawhood was evidently so intimate with Arne's surroundings that he would not have stated it as mere hearsay. Moreover, his account of Arne's will (on the same date) is confirmed by that document, which is preserved at Somerset House. The will is dated December 6, 1777 (the same day as the entry in Mawhood's diary), and is witnessed by Stephen Paxton and by Francis Barthelemon, who married a sister of Mrs. Arne. It seems from this document that Arne rented a house in Bow Street, Covent Garden; he left all his property to his wife and to his only son Michael, and among the bequests is that of 'the sad remains of' his 'excellent organ, mangled, trod to pieces and ruined by and through the villainy of witless servants!' The will, which was proved by Mrs. Arne on March 16, and by Michael Arne on March 21, 1778, also mentions a daughter of Michael's, named Jemima.

The subject of Arne's Masses must not be abandoned without mention of the fact that their publication was actually announced. In 1791 there appeared, in oblong quarto shape, a work entitled 'A Collection of Modern Church Music consisting of Masses &c. composed by the following masters—Webbe, Paxton, Ricci and Dr. Arne. Published by permission of Mr. Webbe and under his immediate inspection. . . . Printed for the Proprietors and sold by T. Skillern . . . 1791.' Pages 1 to 24 of this are in the British Museum (received apparently from Stationers' Hall), and they contain Webbe's Mass in A and the beginning of his Mass in B flat. It seems probable that no more was issued, for the plates were used in 1792 for another work, entitled 'A Collection of Masses, with an Accompaniment for the Organ, Particularly design'd for the use of Small Choirs, By S. Webbe. Publish'd by his Permission and under his immediate Inspection, with others on the same Plan by Ricci and Paxton . . . London, Printed for the Proprietors and sold by J. Bland . . . T. Skillern . . . and Mr. Coghlan, &c. This work was issued by subscription, and Mawhood's name occurs in the list of subscribers. It contains a Preface, signed by John Griffiths, George Carney, John Barkley and Peter Tognarelli, dated London, 1792, but no information is given as to the omission of Arne's Masses. Pages 1 to 23 are identical with the issue of 1791, but p. 24 is a blank, and the plate of p. 25 (of the 1791 issue) is used for p. 26. The work contains six Masses by Webbe, one by an unidentified 'Sig.^r Ricci,' and two by Stephen Paxton. It seems hardly possible that at that date Arne's Masses had already been lost; Mrs. Arne and Michael Arne were both dead, and the only probable explanation of the omission of the Masses is that they were left out on account of the composer's having 'conformed' to the Church of England on his death-bed.

'DIDO AND ÆNEAS.'

By WILLIAM H. CUMMINGS.

The composition of Purcell's opera 'Dido and Æneas' has always been traditionally ascribed to his youthful period. Sir John Hawkins in his History of Music (page 745, vol. ii., Novello's edition) writes: 'One Mr. Josias Priest, a celebrated dancing-master and a composer of stage dances, kept a boarding school for young gentlemen in Leicester Fields. The nature of his profession inclining him to dramatic representations, he got Tate to write, and Purcell to set to music, a little drama, called "Dido and Æneas." Purcell was then of the age of nineteen, but the music of this Opera had so little the appearance of a puerile essay, that there was scarce a musician in England who would not have thought it an honour to have been the author of it. The exhibition of this little piece by the young gentlewomen of the school, to a select audience of their parents and friends was attended with general applause, no small part of which was considered as the due of Purcell.'

This account by Hawkins is very precise, that the opera was performed at Leicester Fields, and that the composer was nineteen years of age, which would have been in 1677. No other record, of playbill or journal, has been discovered in confirmation of Hawkins's statement; but it must be remembered that he obtained his information respecting Purcell and his compositions from the Rev. John Gostling, Purcell's 'wondrous bass,' a member of the Chapel Royal, who died in 1733, and from his son William Gostling, a minor canon—and excellent musician—of Canterbury Cathedral, who died in 1777. Hawkins was probably quite correct in his history; and we know from an advertisement which appeared in the London Gazette that Priest afterwards removed to Chelsea. The announcement reads: 'November 25th, 1680, Josias Priest, dancing master, who kept a school of gentlewomen in Leicester Fields, is removed to the Great School House at Chelsey, that was Mr. Portman's. There will continue the same masters, and others to the improvement of the said school.'

A copy of the libretto of 'Dido and Æneas,' of eight pages, folio, was discovered some years ago, and is now in the library of the Royal College of Music. It is undated, but must have been printed for a performance either in 1680, the year of Priest's removal from Leicester Fields, or some later date. The title is 'An opera perform'd in Mr. Josias Priest's Boarding-School at Chelsey. By Young Gentlewomen. The Words made by Mr. Nat. Tate. The Musick Composed by Mr. Henry Purcell.' There is no indication that this was a first performance: bearing in mind the account given by Sir John Hawkins, it seems quite probable it may have been a repetition of a previous one 'attended with general applause.'

In 1690, Tom D'Urfey published a volume of 'New Poems.' But this title must not be read as meaning that the pieces were newly written: it signifies that they were newly published. D'Urfey was a man who lived by his pen, and must at times have been somewhat pressed to gather a sufficiency of his writings to make a volume. This publication contained an 'Epilogue to the opera of Dido and Æneas perform'd at Mr. Priest's boarding-school at Chelsey, Spoken by the Lady Dorothy Burk.' It has been pointed out that Dorothy Burk was not legally entitled to be called a Lady before 1687, when her father became an earl; but her grandfather was an earl, and it was quite a common practice to give the courtesy title of Lady in such cases. There is a line in the epilogue which reads 'we are Protestants and English nuns,' and it has been suggested that this is evidence that the epilogue was written after the Revolution of 1688; but we cannot forget that Charles II. was regarded by the Protestants as their champion, and that his brother James was looked upon with aversion on account of his Romish faith. Lady Dorothy Burk's father became a Roman Catholic in 1673; his daughter, however, remained faithful to the Protestant religion, and naturally would be found in a school where such a profession would be favoured. There is therefore no reason to doubt that 'Dido and Æneas' was an early opera of Purcell's, probably dated 1677, and that a repetition performance took place in 1680. The advanced character of the music induces some to suppose that it was impossible Purcell could have composed it whilst still young, but genius has no limitations—the Overture to 'A Midsummer Night's Dream,' composed by Mendelssohn at the age of seventeen, is a case in point.

Occasional Notes.

Great interest is being taken in the approaching consecration of the Lady Chapel of the new Liverpool Cathedral, which is fixed for St. Peter's Day, June 29. The Archbishop of York will take part in the service at 11 a.m., assisted by many bishops. As the accommodation of the chapel is limited to between 300 and 400 persons, preference is to be given to subscribers in the seating arrangements for the opening services, to be held on twelve successive days, one service being allotted to each Rural Deanery. The foundation stone of the great cathedral which is now steadily rising on its lofty eminence, St. James's Mount, 155 feet above the Mersey, was laid by His late Majesty King Edward VII. on July 19, 1904. It will stand in a clear and open space of twenty-two acres, and its commanding position recalls in many respects the beauties of Durham. The cathedral will possess not only the highest vaulted roof, but also the highest twin-towers in the country, their height from the ground being 260 feet, and above the sea-level 415 feet. Its superficial area, amounting to about 90,000 square feet, will also exceed that of any other cathedral in the kingdom. The joint architects of the great structure were the late Mr. Bodley, R.A., and Mr. G. Gilbert Scott. The Lady Chapel is the first completed example of the singular grace and beauty of the designs. It is a memorial to two prominent Liverpool families, who have herein shown an example of piety and munificence, which has been followed by many other church-men and church-women in their contributions towards the cost and equipment of the main building. One donor has bequeathed a sum of £10,000 for the great organ, which will occupy a position similar to that in St. Paul's Cathedral, on both sides of the choir. The organ in the Lady Chapel is placed in the lofty gallery, at what is relatively the western end (the cathedral being placed north and south). It has been built by Messrs Willis, and is a two-manual instrument with electric blower. The musical arrangements will be directed by Mr. F. H. Burstall, the able cathedral organist, who was unanimously elected to his responsible post by the Chapter in 1880, when the new Diocese of Liverpool was founded. At the present time there is no endowment for the musical part of the services, which, very largely by Mr. Burstall's exertions, have been maintained at a consistently high standard.

At the recent Kendal Musical Festival there was a new departure in the competitive section which will be of interest to general readers. There were five entries from Westmoreland villages in a competition for 'Pace-egging songs.' The judges were Mr. Frank Kidson, of Leeds, so prominently identified with folk-song lore, and Mr. B. Luard-Selby. Each performance was restricted to five minutes' duration, and in making his award Mr. Kidson eulogized the efforts of the Executive in keeping up the ancient custom. In many parts of the country it was practically extinct, but the five parties from Preston Patrick, Levens, Grasmere (famous for its village plays and 'rush-bearing'), Milnthorpe and Leasgill, showed that it was vigorously maintained in the Lake Country neighbourhood. Mr. Kidson said there were many wild theories respecting the play itself; he would not go so far as to say it originated in Pagan times, but he did believe it came from early Elizabethan days, being originally performed in honour of St. George. The song was quite distinct from the play, but the two had been blended and time had witnessed the gradual absorption into the tradition of such characters as Toss Pot, Lord Nelson and the like. The judges spoke in terms of warm appreciation of the 'get-up' of each village party and, in awarding the prize of place to Preston Patrick, remarked that the best performance on a public platform was that which approximated most closely to actual village-green conditions and not that which has been refined and chastened.

The second California Bach Festival was announced to take place in the Greek Theatre connected with the University of California, Berkeley, on May 21, when the 'St. Matthew' Passion was to be performed by the Bach Choir. It was desired that the entire audience should join in the chorales, supported by the choir, with a chorus of 500 children and the orchestra. It may be remembered by some of our readers that the idea of the audience joining in the chorales was initiated in the performances given at the Royal Albert Hall in 1873, under the conductorship of the late Sir Joseph (then Mr.) Barnby, when the singing of the audience was supported by cornet players placed at the several entrances.

As a rule, operatic secrets leak out quickly in America. But the news that Mr. Oscar Hammerstein had disposed of his interests in the direction of Opera in New York and Philadelphia to the millionaires of the Metropolitan, came as a genuine surprise to the public on both sides of the Atlantic. A cash payment of £400,000 is stated to have been the 'consolatum' which induced the impresario of the Manhattan Opera House to retire from the field, and heavy as the sum undoubtedly is, it is not regarded as unreasonable by the initiated in view of the substantial benefits that will accrue to the surviving party. Thus ends, after a duration of four years, the costliest conflict yet recorded in the world's history of operatic management. During its course, both sides lost the equivalent of huge fortunes. In point of actual expenditure, the directors of the Metropolitan Opera House no doubt suffered the more severely, since theirs was the larger establishment; and Mr. Hammerstein's determined opposition, season after season, both in New York and other leading cities, forced upon them an outlay so vast as to outweigh the advantage of the biggest subscriptions ever obtained for the institution on Broadway. Still Mr. Hammerstein was fighting only as a single individual, wholly dependent upon his own resources, and in the end was bound to succumb to the effects of such a terrific one-sided struggle.

And now comes the question: What good has come of it all? Rather might one ask: What is the extent of the harm that has been done? New York has been glutted for four years with a surfeit of opera such as it could hardly swallow, still less digest; the salaries of opera singers have been artificially raised to a figure out of all proportion alike to the just claims of the artists and the commercial safety of the undertaking. A spirit of jealous rivalry has been aroused, a bitterness of feeling engendered, that is not likely to subside altogether with the signing of the peace contract. A severe reaction cannot fail to ensue, and among its consequences, with competition at an end, New York opera-goers will be found more difficult to please and less decided in their tastes than they were before the 'war' began. What will become of the French répertoire so assiduously and persistently built up at the Manhattan? The Metropolitan directors have taken over the outstanding contracts with Mr. Hammerstein's principal artists. Will they fulfil some and repudiate others, or will they retain the pick for New York and relegate the remainder to the tender mercies of Chicago? On the whole a very pretty situation is still here involved, and it will be extremely interesting to observe how it works out during the season which starts in the coming autumn.

A discussion, rather bewildering we expect to ordinary folk, has been going on recently in the Morning Post and the Westminster Gazette as to what constitutes the proper form of Morris-dancing, which saltatory exercise bids fair to rival the attractions of rinking and the cinematograph. Mr. Cecil J. Sharp, who, by his investigations and persevering propaganda some year or two ago made himself an expert on the topic, taught the dances to the girls of the Esperance Club, and, having to find fault with some of the developments made in that quarter, separated himself from the organization. He thinks the Club has departed from the traditional forms of the dance. Miss Neal, the head of the Club, does not believe in the expert—she says she is 'afraid of the hindering touch of the pedant'—although, of course, she had her first introduction to the dance from the expert against whose dicta she now rebels, and she considers that 'any average person of intelligence can collect a Morris-dance.' A troupe of six young men and six girls is to go to the Brussels Exhibition at the expense of our Board of Trade (whatever that has to do with dancing) in order to show the Belgians this peculiarly national dance. It is the question whether what the troupe is being instructed to do is the true Morris-dance gospel that has occasioned the correspondence to which we have alluded. If our Belgian friends were induced to adopt wrong forms of the dance a serious international difficulty might arise. Hinc illae lacrimae.

A memorable demonstration took place in the Manchester Royal Exchange on May 10, when, after an address of condolence to the Queen Mother and to King George and his Royal Consort had been passed, the 7,000 men present united in singing the National Anthem. Such a fervent full-voiced male chorus has probably never before been heard.

Yvette Guilbert relates (in the Westminster Gazette) recollections of her meeting with the late King Edward. After recalling her first introduction in 1892 at Caen, and her later meeting in 1894 at a dinner-party given by the late Sir Arthur Sullivan, at which King Edward (then Prince of Wales) was present, she goes on to say that:

My last meeting with King Edward was at Marienbad in 1908; it seems only like yesterday; I remember thinking how strong and robust and vigorous his Majesty looked when he entered the room. He had not seen me for certainly over ten years, but he had not at all forgotten me. After dinner I sang several old English songs; talking to me after my performance, his Majesty said, 'I can't think where you get all those old English songs from.' 'Oh, sir,' I replied, 'I get most of them in a book called "Pills for Melancholy." His Majesty laughed heartily at my answer, and said the book was most appropriately named. I think his Majesty thought the name of the book was an invention of my own, but as a matter of fact it was not; the book has supplied me with a great many songs. The memory of the few occasions on which I had the honour to meet King Edward will always be with me. He was a marvellous, a great personality; you felt it directly he came into the room. He was always very courteous and very kindly, and he had the keenest sense of humour.

Among the schemes abandoned owing to King Edward's death, we regret to have to include the Empire Day Festival Concert announced to be given on May 24 at the Crystal Palace by the Imperial Choir, under Dr. Charles Harriss. Much time and pains had been spent on the organization of this choir of 4,000 voices, and there was every prospect of a brilliant success, as King Edward and Queen Alexandra had promised to be present. We understand that the organization is to be kept in being, and that later a gathering of all the forces will take place.

We are requested to state that the Music Festival at Lincoln (June 8 and 9) and York (July 20 and 21) will take place as announced. At Lincoln, Wagner's 'Trauermarsch' and Sullivan's 'In Memoriam' Overture will be added to the programme.

A Viennese boy, Erich Kerngold, aged thirteen, has attracted the attention of Richard Strauss, who says that he has read through Kerngold's compositions with the greatest astonishment, and that his first feeling 'was one of awe and apprehension.'

The University of Cambridge has conferred the honorary degree of Doctor of Music upon Sir Walter Parratt, Professor of Music at Oxford.

UNPUBLISHED LETTERS OF MENDELSSOHN.

Herr Max Unger, of Leipsic, in a recent pamphlet gives five letters of Mendelssohn, of which he believes none have been published. They are all written in English. Three of them are addressed to Vincent Novello. The first is signed 'Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy, 100 Gr. Portland Street 6. May.' In it he speaks of the pleasure 'you made me by your kindness and by procuring me the acquaintance of a talent which till now I only knew by reputation.' He is here most probably referring to the great singer, Clara Anastasia. Then he speaks of a Fugue in E which, as soon as he can find time, 'I will try to write for you.' He evidently means 'copy,' for he adds that he cannot recollect the 'distribution of parts in some passages'; and if his memory fail he will 'get you a copy from Germany where it must now be published in a collection of organ pieces.' No organ fugue in E, remarks Herr Unger, is to be found in Breitkopf & Härtel's thematic catalogue of Mendelssohn's works.

In the second letter, written from Berlin and dated August 22, 1832, the composer speaks of an 'evening and morning service,' which Novello wished him to write. He has finished the 'Te Deum,' and 'does not think it unworth being published.' He wants to know 'what progresses the charming talent of your daughter has made'; and he thanks Novello 'for the kindness you showed me in having my pianoforte-melodies [i.e., the title under which Book I. of the Songs without Words was first published] sold at your house.' We need not quote further from this letter, as it is given in the Musical Times already in November, 1897.

Letter three, written from Berlin, bears the date March 19, 1833. Mendelssohn is 'ashamed to have been silent so very long,' but hopes to meet Novello very soon, when he will endeavour 'to excuse my negligence in answering.' The compositions which he was to send with this letter 'are still unfinished,' for he had been so ill that he 'could not even think of music.' He is looking forward to his visit to London, and to seeing Novello's new compositions, and hearing 'your opinion of mine.' Then he refers to the 'Organ fugue you wished to have.' He has finished it, and is 'exceedingly anxious to know whether you will approve of it or not'; he himself 'likes it very much.' A description is given of a very fine performance of Mozart's 'Zauberflöte' which he had heard in Berlin. He refers also to a portrait of himself which 'Mrs. Novello wanted to have,' and which, he has been informed, has been already sent by a Mr. Simphone. Mendelssohn is coming earlier than usual because he has to go back in May to conduct the Düsseldorf festival. 'These festivals,' he adds, 'are so very famous in this country, that I could not decline it, though I regret the time that I lose by it in England.'

The fourth letter, from Berlin, is addressed to George Hogarth, and is dated July 11, 1838. Hogarth was a candidate for the Professorship at Edinburgh University, and asked Moscheles, as we know from a letter, to try and get a testimonial from Mendelssohn. In this he succeeded, as the following letter to Hogarth shows:

MY DEAR SIR,

It is very kind of you to ask a testimonial of mine of a thing, so well known and appreciated, as your musical attainments are, and indeed I should feel proud if I could hope it could be of the least value to you. This I fear is not the case, but yet I write it to show how gratified I felt by your kind letter, and why should I not say what I think of you in that form as well as in any other? But the English style is not my forte—my pianissimo it is, and therefore I am not quite sure whether you will make out my meaning, but should you guess it, I beg you will alter what you think fit, and make it as English as possible, in order to make it understood by others also. I ask our mutual friend Moscheles to whom I include these lines to do the same and strike out the bad clauses from my bill, and when it has passed two such committees I trust it will do better than in its original shape. Once more I wish you every success you deserve, and I think your friends may be sure you will have it, and then I hope I shall also hear of it. At least none of them can take more interest in it, than I do.

Believe me always,

Yours very truly,

FELIX MENDELSSOHN-BARTHOLDY.

And here is the testimonial itself:

During my last visit to England I had the opportunity of perusing some of Mr. G. Hogarth's writings on Musical History and this as well as the personal intercourse which I had with that gentleman enabled me to form the highest idea of his attainments in the Theory, History and Practice of the Art. Indeed I know few persons uniting, as he does a deep and thorough knowledge of musical science with that warmth of feeling, with that poetical disposition of soul which seems to me quite as necessary to the perfect understanding of works of Art as it is to the true Artist. Mr. Hogarth did not lose this love and lively feeling for music during his scientific pursuits, while he displays a most extended knowledge of that science which form its basis. We have in my country but few writers on music who possess that happy combination which I admire in Mr. Hogarth, and which gives me the highest regard and esteem for him.

Leipzig, July, 1838.

FELIX MENDELSSOHN-BARTHOLDY.

Hogarth was not elected, but John Thomson, who was indeed the first to occupy the chair.

The fifth and last letter was addressed to 'E. Buxton, Messrs. Ewer, 72 Newgate London.' The date is 'Leipzig, 2d Febr. 1847.' Mendelssohn declares his intention of coming to London for the performance of 'Elijah' on the 16th, if he can manage it. He remarks:

A great 'conditio sine qua non' will be a full Rehearsal (you write it is fixed for the 14th), but quite, quite full—not so as I had some years ago for my St. Paul, when we had the Soloists and part of the Orchestra one night, and Chorus and another part of the Orchestra another night. I must have all those that are to perform together for one Rehearsal, else I cannot undertake the thing.

He mentions that he will send the whole of the second part of the oratorio in a few days; also that he shall 'most probably add a Song for the Widow,' in No. 8 (Part 1), and therefore not to engrave it until he has written again. He goes on to speak of two corrections to be made in the proofs, to which attention was duly paid. Last of all, he offers to arrange, if desired, the overture of 'Elijah' as a 'Duet for two performers.' The 'performance on the 16th' refers to the first performance of the revised version of 'Elijah' at Exeter Hall, April 16, 1847, which was conducted by the composer. In the 'History of Mendelssohn's "Elijah,"' by our late editor, F. G. Edwards, there is a letter from Mendelssohn to Bartholomew written the very same day as the last of the five letters, viz., February 2, 1847. In it the composer says in a P.S. he is sending a parcel to Mr. Buxton. This letter, now in the British Museum, was not received there until 1902, so that Mr. Edwards could not possibly include it in his book.

AN ITALIAN BASS ARIA OF REMARKABLE COMPASS.

BY E. VAN DER STRAETEN.

While examining a number of scores from a collection by the famous double-bass player Dragonetti, the writer came across an opera by Attilio Ariosti, the celebrated viola d'amore player, who collaborated with Handel and Buononcini in the opera 'Muzio Scevola,' of which each of the aforementioned composers wrote one act. The opera in question is entitled 'La Fede ne Tradimenti' (Faith in treachery). It states on the title-page that it was performed at the Theatre de Luxembourg by order of Her Majesty, and Ariosti styles himself Master of Her Majesty's Music (Maestro dis Mus. S. Msta.).

The name of this opera does not appear in the list of Ariosti's works given by Fétis and Grove, nor in the more complete list in Eitner's 'Quellen Lexikon.' Neither do they mention the fact that he was at any time Master of the private music of the Queen of France, for the 'Teatro di Luxemburg'—as the name appears on the title-page—can only mean the theatre of the Palais du Luxembourg in Paris.

Ariosti came to England from Berlin about 1715, and played a viola d'amore solo in the performance of Handel's 'Amadis' at the Haymarket. In 1716 he went, according to some biographers, to Italy, and returned to London in 1720 (1723 according to others). Of the fourteen operas enumerated by them, with the dates of their composition, none was written during this period, though Ariosti was then at the height of his fame.

As he was engaged at the Courts of Vienna and Berlin up to 1715, and returned to Italy from London in 1728, living the remainder of his days in strict retirement, it appears obvious that his appointment at the Court of France must have been between 1716 and 1720, and that 'La Fede ne Tradimenti' was written during that time.

Burney speaks of Ariosti as 'a good harmonist,' yet lacking in invention, but Burney is often very severe and not always to be taken too seriously. He says that 'his divisions were blown upon ere he used them,' and adds, as in mitigation, 'but divisions, being the fashionable trimmings of an air, are as general as those of a garment.' He tells us, moreover, that the divisions of Handel and Buononcini were much of a sameness with those of Ariosti!

The fact remains that the above work contains some charming airs, and gives us a good idea of the style of Ariosti's operas. It is scored for wood-wind and strings throughout, the wind instruments appearing only in obligatos when they are accompanied by a figured bass, and without the use of other strings. Only in *Tutti*s are the oboes sometimes used in unison with the violins. Whenever important passages appear in the violins they are marked 'Violon seul,' which seems to confirm the statement by contemporaries that the French orchestral violinists of that time were very indifferent. There is among the arias one accompanied by two flutes and bass, another fine tenor aria and one for soprano by two oboes and bass, and one with a harpsichord 'Sul teatro' (on the stage). A soprano aria has a quaint pizzicato accompaniment for violins.

Whereas the violin parts are written in the usual G clef, there is a second part written in the treble C clef which seems to indicate the use of the Dessus de viole, which was very popular in France at the time.

A very interesting use is made of a solo bassoon, in contrast to a solo violin, in the accompaniment of an aria.

The most interesting of all is a bass aria with a phenomenal compass. Passages of considerable length for this part appear as if written for a high baritone voice, when suddenly in the last aria he descends, after some passages in a high tessitura, to contra C, which appears quite unaccompanied, to give the singer a full opportunity to show off his voice.

ACT III., SCENA 9.

ma non ven-ne dal co-re . . . che il ti-mor tra lab-bri il form-ca-ro si

It was evidently written for a basso with a very exceptional voice, probably a famous singer of his time, and it would be interesting to find out if the name of that singer is known to history.

Church and Organ Music.

OLD ENGLISH ORGAN MUSIC.

(Concluded from page 304.)

If only for its historic associations, the Dirge composed by Thomas Attwood for, and played by him at, the funeral service of Lord Nelson in St. Paul's Cathedral, would be worthy of preservation. Though of but slight dimensions, it would from its grave and simple character still be found quite in keeping for use on like solemn occasions. The opening bars are :

*Largo assai. ♩ = 42.

and the concluding phrase is familiar enough :

Our next example, a Prelude and Fugue in A major, by Samuel Wesley, is a really fine composition, and if of no little difficulty, would well repay the practice necessary for its mastery. The prelude is marked Larghetto maestoso, and is of somewhat free treatment. The fugue, on the following subject, given out by the pedals :

is exceedingly interesting, as the following passages will show :

The last few bars make an effective conclusion :

Yet another Prelude and Fugue, an interesting one by T. A. Walmisley, ends the numbers at present under review. As in that by Wesley, we find here a greater idea of development. The prelude begins in an unobtrusive manner, and so continues until the latter part, where an extension of a passage alternating between the manuals and pedals leads to a statement of the first subject ff. The following gives an idea of the movement :

The subject of the fugue consists of two bars only :

but its later development leads to passages of some difficulty. The following effective climax is reached by episodes of more or less interest :

It only remains to say that the whole series, including those specially described, is printed in the best possible style, for which the house of Novello has long been famous. This, combined with low price, should bring the works within easy reach, when we are sure they would enjoy the wide recognition they so well deserve.

WALTER G. ALCOCK.

We have received the following from Mr. Philip Edwards, of Handsworth, Birmingham, and as it may be useful to some of our readers, we include it in these columns. The 'pointing' of the Psalms is certainly most difficult to teach, and we agree with Mr. Edwards that sufficient trouble in rehearsal is not always the rule, this accounting for much of the failure complained of. There can be no doubt that inability to read the words is often an unsuspected cause of difficulty to the choirmaster, and when to this is added the lack of knowledge of musical notation required in order to sing them intelligently, it is evident that too much time can hardly be devoted to the preparation of each Sunday's work. We recommend individual practice—a separate boy to each verse, which will be found in a short time to give the boys courage and certainty. That, however, is our experience. Mr. Edwards says :

I think it will be admitted that even the greatest men, after the most careful study of the various subjects, which may engross their attention, can seldom be said to have 'stamped out all possibility of error of any kind.' It may, therefore, be occasionally beneficial to briefly examine the opinions of even the most obscure persons, and I trust the few remarks I shall make here will tend to inspire some little effort on the part of those who have hitherto regarded 'chanting' with indifference.

It does not seem ever to have occurred to choirmasters, as a majority, that it is quite possible to point the Psalms in a most intelligent and educated way. All sorts of methods have been devised, and psalters of every description prepared, in order to emphasise this fact, and yet all have failed more or less, inasmuch as 'Psalm chanting' is still a very unsatisfactory performance in most churches.

Now I do not desire for one moment to under-estimate the value of psalters, some of which are certainly specimens of highly skilful and masterly work. I am more particularly concerned with choirmasters. To them it is entrusted to instruct their choirs in the proper methods of 'pointing.'

If choirmasters are themselves familiar with the preface of, say, the well-known and excellent 'Cathedral Psalter,' it is evident they do not instruct their choirs in accordance with its directions. For instance, nobody could fail to understand, from a mere glance through that preface, the way in which bars commencing with the accent should be divided, so that every word or syllable occurring between the accent and the following bar-line may be clearly and distinctly pronounced. And yet one seldom hears a choir which gives less than three-fourths of the bar to the word or syllable marked with the accent, so that whatever number of words or syllables follow, there is only the one remaining half-beat into which they are carelessly crowded in an unintelligible gabble.

In order to overcome this difficulty, psalters have been published showing exactly into how many parts the bars must be divided, above each word or syllable its corresponding minim or crotchet, &c., being printed in musical characters. Here, however, the object has been totally misunderstood in many instances, and whereas the musical characters merely indicate word-duration, we find them regarded as signifying musical tempo, with the result that odd examples of synecopation and such-like inconsistencies are to be noticed during the chanting of the Psalms. (Note the following example):

Here the longer note is given to the second syllable of the word 'chosen,' but the accent is over the first syllable, so that the word should still be sung 'chosen.'

The truth undoubtedly is that carelessness on the part of choirmasters, and consequent laxity on the part of choirs, constitute the chief hindrances to refined and intelligent reading (one might almost say progress of any kind) so far as chanting is concerned.

Here, then, is the obstacle which no quantity of revised psalters will ever overcome. Carelessness is essentially a wilful quality, which can only be reversed by personal effort. Apply this in connection with our present subject, and it means that until choirmasters rouse themselves to a more careful and common-sense study of the Psalms, the full interest and beauty of them will never be revealed as it should be in chanting.

How often one hears chanting described as 'monotonous in the extreme,' simply because scarcely a word throughout is distinctly or even correctly pronounced! No such thing as just accent is observed, so that such words as salvation, confusion, enemy, almighty, &c., are invariably sung thus—salvation, confusion, enemy, almighty. So deeply rooted in the church do these errors seem to have become, that the clergy themselves, with their superior education, frequently make use of them in intonation. No doubt most of us can recall such examples as 'Our Father,' and 'Life everlasting.'

Music should be made to assist, rather than hinder, us in the proper phrasing and pronunciation of words: its aim is to give colouring to them, and to emphasise to the utmost the relative significance and importance of each to the other.

THE NEW ORGAN AT WINCHESTER COLLEGE.

We have received a copy of 'The Wykehamist' containing a very interesting historical sketch by Dr. Sweeting (music-master of the College) of the organs which have done duty in the fine College Chapel. He says: 'The successive organs which have been built for College Chapel give an interesting record of the progress of the science of organ-building in England.' There is hung in 'Music School' a picture of an old portable organ which Dr. Sweeting considers must resemble the first organ placed in 'Chapel' in 1399. These small organs were frequently borrowed—a practice which will not now, in the matter of the present instrument, be so frequent! But in 1520 it was thought well to have a larger organ, and one costing £13 6s. 7d. was presented by John Webbe, a Fellow of the College, this being nearly double the value of those of earlier times! Even considering the value of money in those days, the organ must have been easily 'lendable.' The work of repairing and rebuilding was, as time passed on, put into the hands of such men as Thomas Harris, of Salisbury, his grandson, Renatus Harris, Green, and Bishop. The present fine example of the art, to Dr. Sweeting's specification, is from the factory of Messrs. Norman & Beard, who are to be congratulated upon the entirely successful manner in which they have overcome the many difficulties entrusted to their skill. It contains a few stops of the old instrument.

The organ is erected at the west end of the Chapel, while the console is placed in the old organ-loft over the choir-stalls. The action throughout is electro-pneumatic, the cable being 370 feet in length. For the benefit of those interested in such things, a drawing of the action is exhibited in the Science School—a sign of the times, and a welcome one. (Music, and all connected with it, is surely making its way in our Public Schools!) The blowing is accomplished by means of 'Kinetic' rotary fans and electric motor. The following is a complete specification of the organ:

PEDAL ORGAN, CCC to G, 32 NOTES.

18.	Mixture	4 ranks	"
19.	Tromba harmonic	8 feet	*
20.	Claron harmonic	4 "	*

* On 8-inch wind pressure.

Nos. 19 and 20 are placed in the Choir swell box, and can be played independently from either Great or Choir keyboards.

On the Choir they can also be played at 16-ft. and 8-ft. pitch respectively, and as the pipes are carried down an octave below the compass of the keys, the stops are complete at the lower pitch.

SWELL ORGAN, CC to C, 61 NOTES.

21.	Violine	16 feet	metal.
22.	Open diapason	8 "	"
23.	Violoncello	8 "	"
24.	Lieblich gedeckt	8 "	wood-metal.

31.	Contra hautboy	16 feet	"
32.	Horn	8 "	"
33.	Oboe	8 "	"

Tremulant.

No. 30 is composed of pipes of very small scale, voiced to give keen overtones, and is an octave lower in pitch than is usual for Mixture work.

CHOIR ORGAN, CC to C, 61 NOTES.

34.	Echo diapason	8 feet	metal.
35.	Viol d'orchestre	8 "	"
36.	Viol celeste	8 "	"
37.	Lieblich piccolo	2 "	"

Section No. 2.

38.	Hohl flote	8 feet	wood.
39.	Æoline	8 "	metal.
40.	Harmonic claribel	4 "	wood.
41.	Corno di bassetto	8 "	metal.
42.	Orchestral oboe	8 "	"

The Great reeds can also be played from the Choir manual.

To secure a greater number of colour combinations, the Choir organ has been divided into sections, with a selection of stops on each section, and by utilising the sub-octave or octave couplers for a particular section while the other section is played at its normal pitch, the resources of the organ are considerably increased.

The stops numbered 8, 9, 13, 28, 31, 35, 36, 37, and 42 are at present only prepared for, but as the quieter side of the organ suffers from their absence, it is hoped that they may soon be included.

An oak case for the organ, the gift of Sir Alfred Cripps, will be erected during the summer holidays from a design by Mr. W. D. Caröe, who also designed the galleries.

A correspondent writes :

At the opening of a new organ at the Wesley Church, Freetown, Sierra Leone, a programme of extraordinary length was carried out. After a preliminary service of special hymns, psalms, prayers, lessons and sermon, the business of unveiling the several portions of the organ was begun. First it took eight ladies to draw off the screen from the front and side of the organ, then six more ladies severally carried out the arduous duties of unveiling the lamp for the console, unlocking the sliding doors of the console, opening the door on the right, opening the door on the left, uncovering the adjustable organ bench, and adjusting the bench by using the key. After all these preparations were completed, the soft stops on the Swell organ were opened by a gentleman, and a lady performed.

Next, the loud stops were opened by another gentleman, and another lady gave a performance. A boy, representing the junior chorists, then played, followed by a representative of the senior chorists, who gave a selection on the Swell organ, using stops and accessories ad lib. When the soft stops on the Great organ were opened, performances were given by two more ladies, while the opening of the loud stops was followed by yet another performance. A selection was then played on the Great organ, stops and accessories being used as for the Swell organ.

The bourdon, open diapason, cornopean, Swell to Great, and Great to Pedals, were each opened by a different person, and yet another one gave a performance on the pedals, playing the chromatic scale from lowest C to middle C. Finally a short recital on the entire organ was given by the organist. The proceedings closed with anthem, announcements, hymn and benediction, the whole ceremony seeming to show that, to our dusky friends, time is of no importance.

Observe that in addition to the clergy, choir, collectors, receivers, &c., thirty-two performers took part in the various duties deemed necessary.

After a pause for breath, we find ourselves wondering what the bellows-handle had done. It is not even mentioned !

Messrs. Rogers & Potter, organ-builders, of Shelton, Stoke-on-Trent, have been entrusted with the important work of lowering the pitch of the organ in the Town Hall, Hanley.

Mr. James J. Binns, of Leeds, has been requested to commence the building of a new organ for the new Town Hall, Stoke-on-Trent.

SPECIAL SERVICES.

On the first four nights of Holy Week the usual performances of Bach's 'St. Matthew' Passion were given in St. Patrick's Cathedral, Dublin.

On Sunday, May 1, at Christ Church, Wellington, Salop, a musical service was held, at which an offertory was taken on behalf of the Shropshire Sanatorium for Consumptives. The music given included some numbers from Stainer's 'Daughter of Jairus' and Mendelssohn's String quartet in D major (No. 1). A performance of three movements from Mendelssohn's 'Italian' Symphony was included in the scheme, the orchestra of thirty-five performers also accompanying the vocal solos. Mr. T. McLinden (of the Scottish Orchestra) was the able leader, and Mr. J. Finney conducted.

A musical service was held at the Parish Church, Portsmouth, on Sunday, May 1, at which Travers's 'Ascribe unto the Lord,' selections from Sullivan's 'The Light of the world' and 'The prodigal son,' and R. H. Turner's anthem 'Abide with me' were sung. Mr. R. H. Turner, the organist of the church, directed the music, and also played some organ solos.

Mendelssohn's 'Hymn of Praise' and 'Hear my prayer' were given at St. John's Church, Ryde, I.W., on the evening of May 4, by the Oratorio Choir. The soprano solos were sung by Mrs. G. W. Fellows, while Mr. Douglas Boorman, of Winchester Cathedral, was the tenor soloist. Mr. W. Brennand Smith presided at the organ, and there was no conductor.

At St. Anne's, Soho, on Ascension Day, when the special service for laying the foundation stone of the Parish Hall and Clergy House was held, a performance of Purcell's Te Deum was given at Evensong, under the able direction of the organist of the church, Mr. E. H. Thorne. The accompaniments were rendered by a full orchestra.

At the Parish Church, Epping, on Ascension Day, full choral Evensong was held. The Magnificat and Nunc dimittis were sung to Gadsby's setting in C, and the anthem was a selection from Part II. of Gounod's 'Redemption.' The soloists were Master Frank Cadman and Messrs. Nicholson and Hewitt. Mr. Donald Penrose (the organist and choir-master) played the organ, which was supplemented by a small but efficient orchestra. Mr. Hubert Welton conducted.

A musical service was held at the Temple Church, Bristol, on May 6, to celebrate the completion of the restoration of the chancel. The works chosen for the occasion were the Andante from Schubert's 'Unfinished' Symphony, Mendelssohn's 95th Psalm, the 'Hallelujah' Chorus from the 'Messiah,' and Mendelssohn's 'Cornelius' March. The soloists were Mr. Charles Goulding and Masters Albert Ison and Barraclough. An augmented choir and an efficient orchestra greatly contributed to the success of the musical portion of the Service. Mr. Fothergill, the organist of the church, conducted.

At the Parish Church, Arundel, after Evensong on Whit-Sunday, an organ and orchestral recital was given. Interesting items of the programme were the Adagio and Vivace from Haydn's seventh Symphony, and a March in C by Fabian Rose, while solos upon the violoncello and organ were played by Mr. E. P. Jay and Mr. E. Bartlett respectively, the latter conducting the orchestral works. The collection was given to the funds of the Organists' Benevolent League.

Handel's 'Messiah' was given at Holy Trinity Church, Latimer Road, on Sunday evening, May 8, by the Musical Society. The soloists, were Lady Gweneth Ponsonby, Miss Maud Harvey, Miss Audrey Hyslop and Messrs. George Biss and E. G. Mercer. The organist was Mr. Harry Beck, and Mr. E. G. Mercer conducted.

Music is evidently considered to be of importance at the First Presbyterian Church, Chicago. From a number of service lists we have selected one for March 14, 1909, which includes John E. West's anthem: 'My mouth shall speak the praise of the Lord,' a selection from 'Elijah,' and Frances Allitsen's 'The Lord is my Light.' The accompaniments were sustained by a violin, harp, French horn and the organ. Similar musical services are still being given at the church, under the direction of Mr. P. A. Otis, the choirmaster.

A series of opening recitals has been given by Dr. Eaglefield Hull on the new organ at Honley Parish Church, recently built by Messrs. P. Conacher & Co., of Huddersfield. The instrument was the gift of Miss Brooke and Mr. William Brooke, of Northgate Mount, Honley, and is a great acquisition to the church.

AN INTERESTING ORGAN RECITAL.

How easy it is to sit in an arm-chair and pass criticisms upon men and things in general, and the organ recitalist who plays a Wagner programme in particular! We must confess to some misgivings on seeing such an announcement as 'the programme will consist entirely of the works of Wagner,' and in that superior mood we recently attended one of Mr. Reginald Goss Custard's Wagner recitals at St. Margaret's, Westminster. We were honoured by the organist with a seat at the organ, and have to confess that as the recital progressed we found it necessary to listen with a perfectly open mind, and to appreciate the result for what it was, viz., a revelation in organ technique and mastery of control. That the performer had set himself an exacting task is evident from a perusal of his programme:

Kaiser Marsch	Wagner.
Waldweben
(Forest Murmurs) .. 'Siegfried'	Wagner.
Vorspiel	'Lohengrin'
Entrance of the Gods }	Wagner.
into Walhalla }
Vorspiel	'Tristan und Isolde'
Overture	'Die Meistersinger'

Such music as this demands an organ of far more than average resources, and the St. Margaret's instrument, one of the greatest efforts of the renowned builders (Messrs. J. W. Walker & Sons) is, to our mind at least, worthy to rank with the finest in the country, whether used for the church services or for recital purposes, and does honour to Mr. E. H. Lemare, the former organist, who designed it. The tone throughout is magnificent, and the key and stop action faultless in precision and responsiveness. When to this we add the masterly skill of the St. Margaret's organist, the crowded congregation attracted by every recital he gives is easily accounted for. We were particularly impressed by the performance of the Kaiser Marsch, the Vorspiel to 'Tristan,' and the 'Meistersinger' overture. The notes were actually played, and if the organ did not imitate the orchestra, the effects obtained were logical with regard to the music, while the innumerable stop changes failed neither in precision nor effect. The important matters of phrasing and note-repetition also commended themselves to our critical mind. It was altogether an interesting experience, and encouraged us in the hope of equally enjoying a recital of real organ music at the hands of the same skilful performer.

ORGANIST AND CHOIRMASTER, AND CHOIR APPOINTMENTS.

- Mr. Allan W. Cooper, organist and choirmaster of St. Alban-the-Martyr, Birmingham.
 Mr. Arthur J. Larkman, organist and choirmaster of Holy Trinity Church, Beckenham.
 Mr. George Lightfoot, organist and choirmaster, St. Wilfrid's, Bognor.
 Mr. W. Godfrey Sceats, organist and choirmaster of St. George's Church, Berlin.
 Mr. W. E. Snow, organist and choirmaster of St. James's Church, Aylestone Park, Leicester.
 Mr. Ernest Watson, assistant-organist, St. Stephen's Church, Spitalfields, E.

BELLS, CARILLONS AND CHIMES.

A course of lectures was given on the above subjects at the Royal Institution on April 9, 16 and 23, by Mr. W. W. Starmer, F.R.A.M. As might be expected, great interest was shown in these lectures by such a well-known authority, for Mr. Starmer has made the study of bells and their musical possibilities peculiarly his own.

I.—BELLS AND BELL-TONES.

The lecturer dealt with the earliest bells and the invention of church bells. Large bells were cast as early as the 10th century. Speaking of bell inscriptions, that on the 4th bell of St. Mary the Virgin, Oxford, dated 1612, was dealt with as being of great musical interest and the only one of the kind existing. Sir John Stainer's solution of the music, made in 1895, was played by the lecturer. The qualities of bell-metal and the erroneous idea regarding silver and the tone of bells were next considered, after which a lucid description was given of the making of a bell. The lecture concluded with an exhaustive analysis of the tones a bell produces, and the various methods of tuning employed from the 13th century to the present time. An interesting demonstration was given on two bells—one, an old one, tuned on the common method practised (the one-tone system); the other, a new one, tuned on the method of the greatest masters of bell-founding (the five-tone system). The lecturer's criticism of the clock bells at the Houses of Parliament is of special interest. Referring to the hour-bell—Big Ben—he said: 'Admitting that the bell as a casting is not as good as it should be, it has been very badly used, as nothing but serious injury could result from the cutting of the holes in the sound bow. There is a crack in the metal between the two holes, which are about four inches apart. It is said that these holes were cut to ascertain the extent of the crack. There is no doubt that the crack only extends partially through the sound bow, but to what extent it injures the tone it is difficult to say. However, it is certain that the holes and the crack, apart from any other considerations as to tune, seriously impair the tone of the bell.

'Referring to the tune of the bells, there are further considerations which are of interest. The notes of the diagrams of the tones of each bell were obtained by carefully testing with forks.

'The evidence of the forks is that there are four sounds in each bell, within the compass of two octaves from the hum-note (the lowest note a bell produces), which have been left entirely to take care of themselves and which have no proper relationship to the note of the bell. The fifth sound, known as the nominal, is the only one in each bell which has been dealt with to produce the required notes of the chime. This is exactly what one would expect to find in any bells made at that time. Now, taking the nominals only, what do we find?

- (1) That Big Ben and the 3rd quarter bell are perfect octaves, as they should be. At any rate, the variation is not more than a single vibration either way ;
- (2) That the 1st quarter bell is twenty vibrations sharp ;
- (3) That the 2nd quarter bell is not less than eight vibrations sharp ;
- (4) That the 4th quarter bell is slightly flat, not more than three vibrations.

'The 4th quarter bell may appear to be flatter than it really is on account of the 1st quarter bell being so sharp, making the interval of the 6th between the 1st and 4th bells much greater than it should be.

'The hum-notes and strike-notes, which should be perfect octaves with themselves and with the nominals, in all the bells are never less than a semitone, and in some cases more than a whole tone, sharp or flat of the notes they should be.

'In England, during the past ten years, very great improvements have been made in all things connected with the tuning of bells. At the present time the whole of the five tones—Hum-note, Strike-note, Tierce, Quint and Nominal—can be tuned with the greatest accuracy, and with greater accuracy than ever before possible in the history of bells.

'Under these circumstances, surely bells of national importance should be the very best the country can produce, particularly when the recasting and tuning would cost the comparatively small sum of £1,200.'

II.—CARILLONS AND BELL MUSIC.

The special requirements of bells for change-ringing and for carillon use were first dealt with. The misconception as to the actual pitch of the notes of bells was exemplified by numerous quotations from the scores of well-known composers. In no less than seventeen operas bells have been requisitioned for special effects. English composers, including Sterndale Bennett, Sullivan, Parry, Mackenzie, Villiers Stanford, Cowen and Elgar have used bells with very satisfactory results. Other composers, amongst them Bach, Handel, Mozart, Wagner, Tchaikovsky, Sibelius and Strauss have written for bells in their scores. One of the earliest carillons was erected at Dunkerque in 1437. The carillon clavier, its mechanism and action between the clappers and the keys, received detailed consideration, the lecturer taking that at Malines as a fine example of such an instrument. The carillonneur and his labour in playing were fully described, interesting quotations being given from Evelyn's 'Diary' (1641) and Burney's 'Present State of Music' (1771). The Dutch writer, Fischer (1738), gave the requirements of a good carillonneur as 'a musician with a thorough knowledge of music, good hands and feet and no gout.'

The special requirements of effective music for carillon use were exemplified by the following examples, played by the lecturer on the Celesta (Müstel) with charming effect :

Prelude	Van den Gheyn.
Rondino	J. A. H. Wagenaar.
Two ancient melodies	—
Minuet	A. Wagenaar.
Prelude	Josef Denyn.

III.—CHIMES AND CHIME TUNES (ENGLISH AND CONTINENTAL).

This subject has been so much neglected that at the present time very little information is available, and none in any collective form. Chimes were common in the middle of the 15th century and general in the 16th century. Mechanical figures for striking quarters and hours on bells were in use before the introduction of clock dials. In 1298 there was a clock at St. Paul's with such figures. Chime mechanism was invented soon after the advent of weight clocks. Peter Lightfoot, Abbot of Glastonbury, was probably the earliest maker of such clocks (1335). The following arrangements for quarter chimes were historically and musically considered : Ding Dong, Whittington, Guildford, Cambridge (Westminster), Magdalen, Beverley, and those on Plain-song melodies at Norwich and Canterbury Cathedrals, Roman Catholic Church, Cambridge, and Fort Augustus Abbey. Chime mechanism was described and its development traced from the primitive barrel made of the trunk of a tree into which spikes were driven to the modern machines made by Messrs. Gillett, of Croydon, and the later invention of Messrs. Smith, of Derby.

As a successful example of the mechanism in general use on the Continent, Malines was again chosen. These chimes play music in three or four parts at the hour, half-hour and quarters. The half-quarter is announced by a quick flourish of single notes. They play eight times during the hour, and sound no less than 60,000 notes every twenty-four hours.

The lecturer played on the pianoforte the following specimens of tunes specially suited for chimes :

'Old Johnny Walker' (Henrietta), Wellingborough.

Melody in D major (Dr. S. S. Wesley), Holsworthy.

Two tunes played by the cathedral chimes, Gloucester.

The music played at Malines—half-quarters, quarters, half-hour, and hour.

The music played at Utrecht—quarters and half-hour.

At the conclusion of the lecture a new and important invention of Mr. J. J. Walker, the well-known organ-builder, was shown, by which the tone produced by the bell can be controlled by the player at the clavier, just as in the pianoforte. This can be done mechanically for chime purposes, so that every shade of tone from pp to ff can be produced and controlled.

A matinée in aid of the British Girls' Patriotic League took place at the Royal Court Theatre on May 3, when Mr. Carton's comedy 'Sunlight and Shadow' was preceded by a short musical programme, under the direction of Mr. Martin Shaw. This included the epilogue to Elgar's 'Banner of St. George,' sung by Miss Christine D'Almayne, and a setting of Henley's lines 'England, my England,' by the conductor, sung by Mr. Charles Copland ; the entr'acte music comprised the 'Triumph' chorus from Purcell's 'Dioclesian' and the ballet music from Gluck's 'Paris and Helena.' These were played by members of the South Hampstead Orchestra.

Reviews.

Lexicon der deutschen Konzertliteratur. Von Theodor Müller-Reuter.

(C. F. Kahnt Nachfolger, Leipsic, 1909.)

This work is intended as a guide to conductors, organizers of concerts, writers on music, and amateurs. The compiler first thought of giving composers' names in alphabetical order, but for good reasons which are stated in his preface, this plan was not carried out. He decided to group together composers belonging to one period. This volume contains, as the first group: Schubert, Mendelssohn and Schumann; as second: Berlioz, Liszt, Raff and Wagner; and as third: Draeseke, Reinecke, Bruch and Gernsheim; while at the end comes Richard Strauss. From Schumann's daughter, Fräulein Marie Schumann, the widow of Raff, and from all the living composers mentioned, Professor Müller-Reuter has obtained much valuable information which later on would, in many cases, be lost, or at any rate become most difficult to obtain. And that was his principal reason for commencing with the so-called 'Romantic period.'

He has included orchestral works, concertos and concert pieces with orchestral accompaniment, and chamber works for two or more instruments. He presents the titles exactly as indicated by the composers, for experience has shown him that they are frequently incorrectly given on concert programmes. For instance, Mendelssohn's 'Hebriden' overture is sometimes named 'Fingal's Cave.' The composer wrote "Zweite Konzert-Ouvertüre 'Die Hebriden' oder 'Die Fingalshöhe.'" We have taken a familiar work, and either name clearly indicates the particular overture, but a programme maker wishing to be very exact might think that only one of the two titles was genuine. Then for first performances place, date, day, name of hall, names of soloists and conductors, when possible, are given. There are other details which we must pass over. Of comments of all kinds there is an infinite number, all useful, and many of them most interesting. The volume contains over 600 pages of closely printed matter, and the Professor has evidently spared neither time nor patience in order to make his Lexicon as complete and trustworthy as possible.

The article 'Mendelssohn,' in the new 'Grove' (vol. iii., published in 1907), repeated the oft-told story of the autograph score of the 'Midsummer Night's Dream' having been left in a cab after the composer had conducted from it at Drouet's concert in London in 1829. It is not surprising that Professor Müller-Reuter states that Mendelssohn conducted from his autograph score. In an article bearing the well-known signature 'F. G. E.,' contributed to the Musical Times of January, 1907, it was clearly shown not only that the 'cab' story was a myth, but that the score from which Mendelssohn conducted—which, indeed, had been recently discovered—was 'written throughout very clearly in a professional German copyist's hand.' As the Professor cannot possibly be expected to be acquainted with every article concerning Mendelssohn which has appeared in English musical papers, we feel sure that he will be thankful to have his attention called to the one in question.

To the 'Gastein' symphony reference is made, and as 'the matter will certainly have to be thoroughly dealt with by Schubert investigators,' the long and interesting letter sent by Sir George Grove to the Athenaeum (November 19, 1881) is given, translated of course into German. Sir George is mentioned as the first to call attention to the probable existence of a 'Gastein' symphony. It is however curious that the Professor does not refer to Bauernfeld's article 'Ueber Franz Schubert,' which appeared in the 'Wiener Zeitschrift für Kunst, Literatur, Theater und Mode' in 1829, in which the writer says:—'To the larger works of his (Schubert's) latter years also belongs a symphony written in 1825 at Gastein, for which its author had an especial predilection.' This quotation is taken from an extract from the Bauernfeld article given by Sir George Grove himself in the 'Schubert' article which he wrote for his Dictionary (1st Ed., p. 344; 2nd Ed., p. 306).

Many statements in this Lexicon were obtained by word of mouth or in writing from the composers themselves, or from persons closely connected with them; in the case of Schumann, as already mentioned, from his still living daughter, who placed at the disposal of the Professor, documents in her father's hand-writing. Of matter concerning Wagner's music, the greatest living authority is undoubtedly Dr. Hans Richter. In reply to a request from Professor Müller-Reuter for an authentic account of the memorable performance of the 'Siegfried-Idyll,' when it was given under the composer's direction as a birthday surprise for Frau Cosima Wagner, at Tribschen, near Lucerne, on December 25, 1870, he received a long letter from Richter, dated September 18, 1909, from which we give a brief but graphic extract. After naming the performers, he adds:—'I undertook the few notes for the trumpet, the instrument having been lent me by a musician belonging to the military band. In order to make no noise in the house, I went every day to practise on the trumpet in the (then) empty barracks. These daily goings out, and several journeys to Zurich, aroused suspicion. Frau Wagner imagined that I was not so industrious as formerly; the highly successful performance of the Idyll, however, cleared up this misunderstanding.' Dr. Richter also mentions that the master made him a present of the original score of the Idyll.

Capriccioso. By C. Hubert H. Parry.

Tristesse. By J. Hollman.

Aspiration. By John E. West.

Serenade. By Edward Elgar.

Rigaudon. By J. Ph. Rameau.

[Novello & Co., Ltd.]

Sir Hubert Parry's 'Capriccioso' from his Suite (No. 1) in D for violin and pianoforte has been issued in separate form, and will thus be certain to claim many new admirers.

Mr. Gerald Walenn has transcribed Hollman's 'Tristesse,'—originally written for violoncello and pianoforte—for violin. It is one of those beautifully simple little pieces which must rivet attention if performed on either instrument; but the richer, deeper tone of the violoncello is required to give it its full spiritual intention.

'Aspiration,' by John E. West, was originally composed for organ solo, but is now arranged by the composer for violin and pianoforte. It makes a particularly well-written, effective violin piece, and its beauty would be still further enhanced, we fancy, if it were accompanied on the organ. Violinists on the look out for suitable solos for playing in churches should make a note of this.

The delightful little 'Serenade' from Elgar's Suite Wand of Youth (No. 1) has been variously transcribed for violin and pianoforte, violoncello and pianoforte, and as an additional number for Novello's Albums for Pianoforte and Stringed Instruments. Particularly in the last arrangement it is likely to be very warmly welcomed. The transcriptions have been carefully handled by Mr. John Pointer.

We wonder how many transcriptions have been made of Rameau's celebrated 'Rigaudon,' from his opera 'Dardanus,' since first the work must have delighted a French public on its production, at the Académie, on October 19, 1739. Certainly the new arrangement by John Slatter, for inclusion in the School Band Music series, edited by Dr. W. G. McNaught, is one of the best; the fascinating, irresistible swing of this dainty Rigaudon will captivate the hearts and inspire the fingers of many young players—in school and out of it.

Musical England. By William Johnson Galloway.

[Christophers.]

This recently published book affords an interesting and fairly comprehensive survey of the conditions and prospects of musical progress in this country. Mr. Galloway is a distinguished amateur who gives much of his time, and not a little of his means, in furthering the cause of music. He brings to his present task a breadth of view and an acquaintance with facts (for the collection and collation of which he expresses his indebtedness to Mr. H. B. Dickinson) that make his book valuable to the historian. There are chapters on Music in the Schools, Municipal Music, Music in the Army and the Navy, Festivals, Concerts, Musical Societies, The Competitive Movement, Opera, and The Outlook.

The importance and value of the work carried on in the elementary schools is duly recognised, and the utility of the Tonic Sol-fa system is conceded, provided that it is made to lead on to the Staff notation. But there is the fatal chasm of the years between the school and the adult life to consider. To some extent in large towns this chasm, which generally stops progress, is bridged by the Evening Continuation Schools. The Choral Unions, which in London have grown out of these schools, are performing a national work in preserving potential chorists from atrophy.

In the higher branches of the art, the influence of the festivals now multiplying so fast is described. The fact that so many of them are organized in the interests of charity is commented on with some severity in so far as this object results in a scale of prohibitive prices which seriously restricts the local value of the functions by excluding the poorer classes. We are afraid it is too true that ordinary folk have very little contact with the great festivals. They are attended mainly by ladies of the leisured class.

In discussing the work of provincial musical societies, Mr. Galloway says, in reference to the Manchester situation, that while there may have been some justification for the selection of Dr. Richter as conductor some years ago, the continuance of the policy of selecting a foreigner to control the chief concerts of a city that rivals London in musical energy—a questionable dictum—is open to grave objection. He goes on to say that: 'there are several English conductors fully qualified to succeed him; and if those in authority do not appoint one of them, they will lose a golden opportunity of encouraging native musicians, and will once more make themselves the laughing stock of discerning foreigners who appreciate better than we do ourselves the merits of our English conductors.'

The competitive movement is dealt with sympathetically and at considerable length. The supreme importance of the movement is said to lie in the fact that it is 'essentially popular, educative and cheap.' We must demur to the statement that English competitions are certainly less than thirty years old. As we write, a document faces us testifying to the award in 1874 of £100 prize at the National Music Meetings held at the Crystal Palace in that year. Mr. Galloway probably refers to the establishment of local 'choir' competitions, which in England were first instituted at Stratford in 1882.

The chapter on Opera analyses the situation with clearness. Mr. Galloway concludes that if we are to have national opera established in this country, it can only be done as Louis XIV. did in France, by getting the people accustomed to the taste of music. He advocates a subsidy from imperial or local sources.

There are many points raised in Mr. Galloway's book that invite discussion. But whether we always agree with him or not, the value of his inquiries is undoubted.

An arrangement for the organ of H. Walford Davies's 'Solemn Melody.' By the Composer.

Adagio for the organ. By Gustav Merkel. Edited by John E. West.

Postlude for the organ. By Hugh Blair.
Rondo Capriccio (a study in accents) for the Organ. By Edwin H. Lemare. (No. 29 of his 'Original compositions for the organ'.)

[Novello & Co., Ltd.]

Dr. Walford Davies adds to the high value of his 'Solemn Melody' by arranging it for the organ, to which instrument the music is unusually suitable by reason of its harmonic scheme and stately movement. The arrangement is certain to be widely used.

The Adagio by Merkel seems to us one of the most spontaneous of his many compositions, and we are glad to see the music in well-known form, together with the reliable directions given by the accomplished editor.

Dr. Blair's Postlude is a notable addition to the organist's repertoire, for its strenuous and energetic movement is refreshing after the thousands of Andantes and similar supine trifles to which we are accustomed. There are some passages in the Postlude which would command the respect of advanced organists, but the piece is worth any trouble it may give.

Mr. Lemare's Rondo Capriccio is a sparkling and ingeniously developed little piece which will undoubtedly please those who delight in surmounting technical difficulties. It forms a welcome addition to the already large number of pieces by this accomplished musician, and will no doubt become widely known.

Hull Organs and Organists. By Dr. G. H. Smith.

[A. Brown & Sons, London and Hull.]

Sweeping statements can generally be refuted, and though it has been said that 'if a line be drawn from York to London, all that part lying to the east will be found unmusical,' the book before us requires that line to be so bent as not to include Hull! For Dr. Smith succeeds in no small degree in giving details, not only of the organs, organists, and Church music, but of the musical societies and festivals in the town, which will interest all readers. He certainly shows that music has been cultivated there to some considerable extent, which cannot but have influenced the musical taste of the neighbourhood. Though the possibilities of earlier years seem to have been unusually restricted, there can be no doubt that enthusiasm has been at work, and with the opportunities and recognition of the art to-day, results are showing which must be encouraging to those now responsible for the music in Hull. An account of the Hull and East Riding College of Music—of which Dr. Smith is Principal—is included, while the specifications of the more important organs will prove interesting. So also is the portrait of the Rev. J. B. Dykes, whose connection with Hull began with his birth and extended over several years. Altogether, Dr. Smith's book is instructive and exceedingly well-written.

Could aught of song. By J. D. Davis.

Elleen. Words by Charles F. Grindrod. Music by Ivor Atkins.

The three fishers. By J. M. Capel.

Three songs. Words by Pearl Humphrey. Music by Norah Marriott.

Two songs. By Noel Johnson.

[Novello & Co., Ltd.]

Mr. J. D. Davis's individual style of thought, which, to his credit, is free from extravagance, is well exemplified in his setting of Burns's poem 'Could aught of song declare my pains.' The voice part is simple and tuneful, and the accompaniment well varied and musicianly. Mr. Atkins's 'Elleen' has much of the spirit of English folk-song. Its melody is gracefully turned, vocal, and supported by an interesting accompaniment. The setting of Kingsley's 'Three fishers,' by Mr. J. M. Capel, shows no ambitious design to provide dramatic musical illustration of the story, and its simplicity will undoubtedly be a recommendation. The above-mentioned songs are each published in two keys.

The chief characteristic of the three songs entitled 'April,' 'June' and 'October,' by Norah Marriott is the artistic nature of the accompaniments. The vocal part, which contains no elements of difficulty, is suitable for a medium voice. Mr. Noel Johnson's two songs, 'Take thou this rose' and 'Affinity,' which are published in three keys, are cast in a mould familiar to English musical amateurs and should appeal to a large public.

They are at rest. Elegy for unaccompanied chorus (S.A.T.B.). By Edward Elgar.

[Novello & Co., Ltd.]

This beautiful setting of deeply impressive words (by Cardinal Newman) may be recommended to those who wish for a new expression of the thoughts suggested at a time of bereavement. The work is admirably adapted for a Memorial Service, and if not actually easy to sing, would give little trouble to many choirs of to-day.

Obituary.

We regret to record the following deaths:

MADAME MICHELLE FERDINANDE PAULINE VIARDOT-GARCIA, which occurred at Paris on May 18. Born at Paris on July 18, 1821, the daughter of Manuel Garcia del Popolo (the elder), she soon showed unusual musical gifts. She was trained vocally by her mother, took pianoforte lessons from Liszt, and studied counterpoint under Reicha. In 1837, she made her début as a singer in Brussels at a concert given by the violinist De Beriot (who married her elder sister, the famous singer Maria Malibran). On May 9, 1839, she made her first appearance in London at Her Majesty's Theatre in the part of Desdemona in Rossini's 'Otello.' In the autumn of the same year she was engaged for the Théâtre Lyrique in Paris by the impresario Louis Viardot, whom she married in the following year. She appeared every season in London from 1848 to 1858. On the production of Meyerbeer's 'Le Prophète' in 1849 at the Paris Opéra, she created the part of Fides, with which the leading parts in Gluck's 'Orfeo' and 'Alceste,' constituted her most important rôles. She retired from the stage in 1863, and devoted her time to teaching, Mesdames Desirée Artôt, Marianne Brandt, and Antoinette Sterling being among her pupils. It may perhaps not be without interest to mention that she possessed a unique collection of musical autographs, including the original manuscripts of Bach's cantata 'Schmücke dich,' the score of Mozart's 'Don Giovanni,' and Mendelssohn's '42nd Psalm.' Schumann dedicated his first volume of songs, the 'Liederkreis' (Op. 24), to her.

The famous violoncellist, PROF. BERNHARD COSSMANN, on May 7 at Frankfurt in his eighty-ninth year. Born at Dessau, he became a member of the orchestra of the Italian Opera in Paris in 1840. Later he joined the Gewandhaus Orchestra at Leipsic. The year 1849 found him, in London, and in the following year he took up an appointment at Weimar, where he became a regular member of a trio with Joachim and Liszt. He was professor at the Moscow Conservatoire in 1866, and afterwards settled in Frankfurt. The deceased was a soloist of great reputation in his day, and enjoyed the friendship of many prominent men, among them Bülow, Brahms, Ferdinand David and Schumann.

HERR JULIUS BLÜTHNER, the founder of the famous pianoforte firm, on April 13, at Leipsic. He was born at Falkenberg, near Merseburg, in Saxony, on March 11, 1824. His father, who was a cabinet-maker, apprenticed him to the same trade; but he soon went into the pianoforte business. On November 7, 1853, he started, with five workmen, the factory in Leipsic, which has since grown to its present enormous dimensions. The deceased held the high title of Geheimer Kommerzienrath.

WILLIAM AMPS, M.A., on May 20, at St. Peter's College, Cambridge, at an advanced age. Mr. Amps was Organist of King's College, Cambridge, from 1855 to 1876, when he resigned the appointment. He was also Organist of Peterhouse and Christ's College, and conductor of the Cambridge University Musical Society.

PROF. GUSTAV F. JANSEN, which occurred on May 3 at Hanover, in his eightieth year. The deceased made a special study of Robert Schumann, whose letters and other literary works he edited.

An excellent portrait in oils of Mr. Jonathan Barnard, late manager of the London Sunday School Choir, has been placed in the Council Chambers of the Sunday School Union, Old Bailey, and on Saturday, May 28, at 4 p.m., a monument erected to his memory was to be unveiled in Ilford Cemetery. On June 25, at the Sunday School Union's Convalescent Home at Clacton-on-Sea, a ward for children will be dedicated to his memory by Sir Francis F. Belsey, J.P., President of the Choir and Chairman of the Sunday School Union Council.

MEMORIAL SERVICES.

WESTMINSTER ABBEY.

Of all churches in which to hold a National Memorial Service, Westminster Abbey must stand first, and when that service is inspired by the death of the greatest King this country has ever known, it must surely be felt that under no other conditions could the nation's grief be so truly expressed, unless indeed at the actual graveside. Such a service as that which took place at Westminster Abbey at 2 o'clock on Friday, May 20, undoubtedly brought the enormous congregation which attended it into most intimate sympathy with all that took place at Windsor, and must have been, to many, a fitting substitute for the greater solemnity in progress there. The music at Westminster was naturally of great importance and certainly of deep meaning. Sir Frederick Bridge had chosen no less than five funeral marches, viz., the 'Marche Solennelle' by Schubert, that composed by Henry Purcell for the funeral of Queen Mary in 1694, Beethoven's 'Funeral March' from the Pianoforte sonata, Tchaikovsky's in C minor, and Mendelssohn's in E minor, from the 'Songs without words.' The first three were played by Sir Frederick, the organ being supplemented by brass and drums, and Dr. Alcock played the remaining two, the Tchaikovsky requiring the organ only. The actual service commenced most impressively by the singing in procession (priest and choir alternately) of the penitential verses of Psalm II., to the setting by Sir John Stainer. This was followed by the 'Très égales,' for four trombones, by Beethoven. This innovation of an instrumental interlude during the Service was proposed by the Dean (Dr. J. Armytage Robinson), who is always ready to recognise music as a real aid to religion. Certainly, with the performers placed in the Triforium, nothing could have been more impressive. The Burial Sentences were sung to the setting by Dr. Croft. Psalm xc. was then sung to Purcell's Chant in G minor and major. After the reading of the Funeral Lesson, a selection from Handel's fine anthem 'The ways of Zion do mourn' was sung, accompanied by the organ, brass and drums, Sir Frederick Bridge conducting. The order of service then led by supplications, responses, and prayers to the second anthem, 'The souls of the righteous,' by Sir John Goss. This had been arranged by Sir Frederick to these words, and nothing could have been more suitable to the moment and the occasion. The hymn 'O God, our help in ages past' was then sung by the choir and congregation, the fifth and sixth verses, however, being taken softly by the choir alone. The hymn was quite rightly taken very slowly, with the result that all could join with confidence and inspiring effect. After the Benediction, Gibbons's Amen (sung at King Edward's Coronation) was given, and completed a memorable service. The Dead March in 'Saul' was then played by Sir Frederick, and this was followed by Chopin's 'Marche Funèbre,' with Dr. Alcock at the organ, the brass instruments and drums assisting in both pieces. It should be added that Dr. John E. Borland was responsible for the scoring of the marches and Handel's anthem, and thus contributed in no small degree to the solemnity of the service.

ST. PAUL'S CATHEDRAL.

A vast congregation assembled at the special service in the Cathedral on the afternoon of May 20, to pay loyal and affectionate tribute to the memory of King Edward VII. Among the various musical bodies represented were the Worshipful Company of Musicians, the Royal College of Music, the Royal Academy of Music, the Guildhall School of Music, the London Academy of Music, and the Royal College of Organists. For an hour before the beginning of the service the band of the Royal Military School of Music, Kneller Hall, under the able conductorship of Captain Stretton, played a selection of appropriate music, this including 'Judea' ('Mors et Vita'), Gounod, the slow movement from Schubert's 'Unfinished' Symphony and Sullivan's 'In Memoriam' Overture. The service proper commenced with the singing of the opening sentences from the Burial Office to Croft's immortal music. These were immediately followed by Purcell's beautiful setting of the later sentence, 'Thou knowest, Lord.' The special Psalms v., xxiii., and xxvii., were sung to chants by Hervey, Barnby, and Morley, and the Benedictus to the setting in C by Best, the latter being followed by an antiphon, 'I heard a voice from heaven,' to expressive music by Sir Charles Stanford. Mention should also be made of the short antiphon, 'Make Thy way plain before my face,' which was sung before and after the Psalms. This had been adapted most happily by Sir George Martin to a response from Tallis's five-part setting of the Litany, and proved very effective. The anthem was that noble dirge composed by Sir John Goss for the funeral of the Duke of Wellington at St. Paul's in 1852, and beginning with the words, 'And the King said to all the people.' Perhaps no more fitting selection than this could have been found, and, needless to say, ample justice was done to it on the present occasion. The anthem was followed by Handel's Dead March from 'Saul,' played by the military band and organ. The effect in the immense building, of the long solo for drums which preceded and followed the March, was thrilling beyond all description. The hymn was, 'O God, our help in ages past,' in which the whole congregation sympathetically joined. After the Benediction, Sir George Martin's impressive setting of the 'De profundis' was sung, and the congregation dispersed to the music of Gounod's 'March Solennelle,' played by the military band. Sir George Martin conducted the service music with his accustomed watchfulness and care, and Mr. Charles Macpherson accompanied on the organ with commendable taste and reserve.

MAGDALEN COLLEGE, OXFORD.

On Friday, May 20, after the usual full cathedral service at 10, there was a special Memorial Service, commencing at 11 a.m. This consisted of:

1. (1) Dies irae
(2) Tuba mirum
(3) Rex tremenda majestatis } Mozart's 'Requiem.'
(4) Lacrymosa
2. Croft's setting to 'I am the Resurrection and the Life,' &c.
3. Psalm xc. 'Lord, Thou hast been our refuge,' to Felton's chant.
4. 'Man that is born of a woman,' &c., to Croft's music.
5. 'Thou knowest, Lord' (Purcell).
6. Anthem: 'His body is buried in peace' (Handel).
7. Special Collects and Blessing.
8. Dead March in 'Saul.'

After full choral Evensong, Chopin's Funeral March was played.

In Memoriam Organ Recitals were given by Mr. S. Wallbank, at All Souls' Church, Leeds; by Mr. William Biller at the Concert Hall, Liscard; by Mr. James Tomlinson (Corporation organist), at the Public Hall, Preston; by Mr. H. Matthias Turton, St. Aidan's, Leeds; by Dr. A. L. Eaglefield Hull at Honley Parish Church; and by Dr. A. L. Peace, St. George's Hall, Liverpool (three recitals).

ROYAL OPERA, COVENT GARDEN.

Misfortunes, chiefly meteorological, marred the opening weeks of the Grand Syndicate's season of opera at Covent Garden, which began on April 23. The first performance, which consisted of Verdi's 'Traviata,' was shorn of much of its brilliance by the absence of its bright, particular star, Madame Tetrassini, who at the last moment was unable to sing by reason of a bronchial cold. The services of Madame Donalda were hastily secured and the performance was given, although not without some weak points, due to the fact that the charming Canadian vocalist seemed strange to music in which she had previously won renown. She could not, however, altogether disguise the excellence of her methods nor the purity of her voice, and with the assistance of Mr. John McCormack as Alfredo, and Signor Sammarco as Germont, won a hearty reception.

TWO CYCLES OF THE 'RING.'

A feature of the opening stages has been two special performances of Wagner's 'Niblung's Ring,' with 'Tristan and Isolde' added, under the direction of Dr. Richter. The famous Viennese conductor, so well-beloved of British musical amateurs was, to the regret of all, unable to direct more than the first cycle, since at its close he was seized with illness that has necessitated his abandonment of all work for the present. Four different substitutes were found to carry on his task, i.e., Herr von Schuch (of the Dresden Opera), Dr. Rottenburg, Herr Paul Drach and Herr Alfred Hertz (of New York). Consequently there has been an interesting variety of readings. The artists taking part in the representation have been, for the most part, familiar. Among these may be placed Herr Van Rooy, who made his reappearance in his best part next to the 'Flying Dutchman,' that of Wotan, but he was obliged to submit to the English climate, and his place in the second performance of 'Die Walküre' was taken by Herr Schützendorf, whose efforts gave rise to some rather invidious comparisons. His best work was done in 'Götterdämmerung,' Herr Cornelius, who appeared in the first 'Siegfried,' was evidently not in good voice, and was absent from 'Götterdämmerung,' his place being taken by Herr Stratz, who is a useful if not a highly impressive tenor. Herr Foss, a Danish bass, who created a good impression by his work as Fafner, Hunding and Hagen, made his first appearance. Madame Saltzmann-Stevens, favourably remembered for her efforts in the performances in English of this work, was the Brünnhilde in all three sections. This American artist has devoted her attention almost exclusively to this character, with results that at least provide consistency. Her excursion into other Wagnerian realms represented by 'Tristan and Isolde' was further proof of the earnestness of her intentions, although her experience is as yet scarcely wide enough to enable her to give a completely satisfactory version of this trying part. She received workmanlike if not inspired support from Herr Burrian, who made his reappearance. Sterling worth has once again been the feature of the efforts of Madame Kirkby Lunn, who has shown herself both immune from the effects of climate and from the vocal idiosyncrasies which mar the endeavours of so many exponents of the 'Ring.' Herr Bechstein has again given his inimitable representation of Mime. Illness and changes in the arrangements necessitated by the closing of the house in consequence of the death of King Edward allowed us to hear the excellent artist, Madame Knapfer-Egeli, as Sieglinde, and have introduced a new-comer of note in Madame Kurt, who appeared as Brünnhilde in 'Die Walküre.' Finally, the Wagnerian series was distinguished by the presence of Madame Litvinne, an admirable artist who has not appeared in London for four years.

FRENCH AND ITALIAN EXAMPLES

The other operas produced have represented the usual contrasts in style afforded by drawing upon French and Italian operas of all dates, but it cannot be denied that such variety is not only attractive but distinctly calculated to provide exactly what is wanted, namely, liberal operatic education. In succession to 'La Traviata' the same composer's 'Rigoletto' was mounted, when Madame Tetrassini made her postponed appearance and soon showed that her E flat in alt. was unaffected by her indisposition. A growing tendency to wait for Madame Tetrassini's high notes is to be regretted, for there is much that is truly admirable in her interpretation of the old Italian music a little lower in the scale, as she clearly demonstrated in the 'Barber of Seville' which followed. In both operas Signor Rostowski, a new Russian tenor, made his appearance, displaying a musical voice and a good but rather artificial style. In the succeeding week Saint-Saëns's 'Samson and Delilah' was given, and in this Madame Kirkby Lunn once again demonstrated her great powers. It is probable that she derived much stimulus from the Samson of M. Franz, a young French tenor of uncommon beauty of voice and general charm of manner. These he displayed to even better effect in Gounod's 'Faust,' when he completely established his position in the favour of the audience, who received him, as was his undoubted due, with enthusiasm. The Marguerite was Madame Edvina, who showed advance in her art, and the Mephistopheles was Signor Marcoux, an artist of considerable versatility. At this performance M. Lestelly, a French baritone, appeared as Valentine, but he impressed more by his acting than by his singing, which is not very powerful. The performance of Verdi's ever attractive 'Aida,' with new and effective scenery, was made the occasion for the first appearances of Mlle. Karola and Signor Zarola as the leading characters. Mlle. Karola indicated the valuable asset of experience in her reading, and displayed a voice of good quality, though the method of its use is not ideal. As her lover, Signor Zerola sang with immense vigour, displaying all the good features of a typical robust tenor and completely catching the ear of the audience. Excellent work was done by Madame Kirkby Lunn, Signor Sammarco, Mr. Murray Davey and Signor Marcoux. Signor Campanini and M. Frigara, as in previous years, have filled the post of conductor at these performances, and a feature of the season is to be found in the increasing number of English-speaking artists employed, among whom Mr. Murray Davey and Mr. Edmund Burke are entitled to special mention.

The last week of the month was marked by an extension of the scheme by the inclusion of Bellini's 'La Sonnambula,' which, revived last year purely and simply for the benefit of Madame Tetrazzini, won considerable public support on its undoubted merits as an opera, and by the rentrée of Mlle. Destin and the London début of Mr. Riccardo Martin, an American tenor. Later on, 'Louise,' 'Pelléas et Mélisande,' 'Lakmé,' 'Linda di Chamounix' and other works, familiar and unfamiliar, are promised.

THE BEECHAM OPERA COMIQUE SEASON.

HIS MAJESTY'S THEATRE.

This highly-promising scheme was to have been inaugurated on May 9, but the death of King Edward necessitated postponement until May 12, on which night the fantastic opera 'Tales of Hoffman,' by Offenbach (whose real name was Jacques Levy) was given with considerable success. The story certainly justifies the adjective 'fantastic.' It exhibits the hero as an unfortunate Don Juan who is pursued by a malevolent influence. But with all its impossibilities it inspired some of the best music that flowed from Offenbach's fertile brain. There is often a vein of seriousness and an approach to depth of expression that are not generally associated with this composer's name. The music is always melodious and stately, and easy to follow. The cast, which was a strong one, included Mesdames Nora D'Argel, Zélie de Lussan, Ruth Vincent, Carrie Tubb, Muriel Terry, and Messrs. John Bardsley, Frederic Austin, Robert Radford and John Coates. The chief burden of the performance was sustained by Mr. Coates, who found ample opportunity for the display of his varied powers as actor and singer. Mr. Beecham conducted with his usual skill, and the orchestra was a constant pleasure to hear. The opera ought to draw many good audiences, especially as it is sung in English, mostly by English singers.

The only other opera produced up to the time of our going to press was Humperdinck's 'Hänsel and Gretel.' In this charmingly melodious work Miss Muriel Terry and Miss Ruth Vincent again sang and acted with convincing effect, and Miss Carrie Tubb was a duly grotesque Witch. The other chief characters were taken by Mr. Harry Dearth, Miss Christine D'Almayne, and Miss Carmen Hill. The opera, which had obviously been admirably rehearsed, was conducted by Mr. Hamish MacCunn.

The remainder of the season, which will last until July 30, will, it may be hoped, draw the support this bold and well-managed enterprise thoroughly deserves.

PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.

QUEEN'S HALL, MAY 19.

This concert concluded the ninety-eighth season of this Society. The most notable feature of the programme was the first performance in England of Rachmaninoff's Symphony in E minor. The performance of this took nearly an hour, and left an impression of strength and virility, if not of great interest. The Adagio movement became somewhat tedious, but the final movement was an exhilarating climax, and exhibited the composer's skill as a contrapuntist and his power to score effectively. Another work of considerable dimensions that was brought forward was a Fantastic suite for pianoforte and orchestra by Ernest Schelling, who played the solo part with very great effect. The suite is in four movements. The first, an Allegro marziale, is not very attractive, but all the other movements—Scherzo, Intermezzo (Adagio) and a Molto vivace—are delightful examples of light treatment and lucidity. Mr. Schelling also played as solos the Chant Polonoise (No. 5), Chopin-Liszt, and the Polonoise in A flat, Chopin. In the performance of the latter we can only say that Mr. Schelling astonished his friends and critics by the eccentricity of his reading. Madame Gerhardt sang Elisabeth's Prayer at an exceptionally slow pace that obscured the rhythm, but she afterwards gave beautiful interpretations of 'Wiegenlied' and 'Heimliche Aufforderung' by Richard Strauss. A sensational performance of Liszt's Rhapsody Hongroise No. 1, in F, was a memorable item of the programme, which throughout was conducted in masterly fashion by Mr. Arthur Nikisch.

WESTMORELAND MUSICAL FESTIVAL.

(FROM OUR SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT.)

Regular visitors to the Westmoreland Festival this year could not escape from the consciousness of something missing. Miss Mary Wakefield, its fountress, was kept away by illness from this twenty-third meeting of the festival ever to be associated with her name: her genial presence, and homely, helpful words of counsel and encouragement were sorely missed. And in spirit everybody joined in the messages of sympathy sent to the sufferer in her sick-chamber, and back came the characteristic words of grateful thanks, 'Ever deep and true and tender is the North.'

Held on April 27-30 in its first (but now transformed) home, the St. George's Hall of Kendal, this meeting combined, as does no other similar northern meeting, competitive work during the daytime with evening concerts on practically a 'grand festival' scale, and as a consequence there were not lacking evidences of strain on the singers entailed by participation in both competitions and concerts during the period of the festival.

Two choral performances were given on the second and third evenings under Mr. Henry J. Wood's conductorship, with the assistance of about sixty members of the Queen's Hall Orchestra. Two distinct festival choruses were utilised—one drawn from the villages and hamlets of the fells and vales of North Westmoreland, and the other from the lowland centres fringing Morecambe Bay; incidentally, one noticed the superior resonance of the voices drawn from the hills.

Contingents from sixteen of these somewhat scattered centres had been rehearsed separately by their own conductors, with periodical visits from Mr. Alfred H. Willink, the enthusiastic honorary chorus-master, but without more joint rehearsals it could hardly be expected that such unanimity and cohesion would be obtained as in the case of a choir continually practising together as one unit. So in considering such performances as were given of Bach's 'Christmas Oratorio' (Parts I. and II.) and 'Magnificat,' Dvorák's 'Te Deum,' and Sullivan's 'Golden Legend,' it would not be fair to apply ordinary standards of judgment. Against any shortcomings must be set the central fact that under the fostering care of the organizers of this festival the whole countryside has been brought from outer darkness into the light of Bach, Beethoven and Brahms.

In what other way, it may be asked, could such a musical awakening have been achieved? So when your blat 'festival-trotter' comes along, conscious of his great superiority, one may well ask: Is it a light thing to have gripped the interests and kindled the enthusiasms, to have brought such hallowing, uplifting influences into the lives of these upland folk, most of whom dwell remote from all opportunities for musical intercourse such as are afforded in our larger industrial centres? Remembering the relatively feeble powers of some of the contingents, the marvel is that the performances were so good. There was a general consensus of opinion that the choral singing this year showed a very marked advance on that of the last meeting held two years ago. The Bach and Dvorák were better done than the 'Golden Legend,' and the fact that quite half-a-dozen

Bach cantatas have been given of late years at Kendal doubtless accounts for the grip of a good Bach style displayed by the choir. One felt that there was a good deal in common between Bach's sturdy, joyous music, and these dwellers amidst the fell-lands, communing with Nature in all her moods, there being a simplicity and naturalness about the choir's expression which was very telling. Again, in the Dvorák 'Te Deum' one noted an appropriate bigness of utterance. Miss Esta d'Argo, Miss Edith Miller, Miss Elsie Alexander, Mr. Gervase Elwes and Mr. Thorpe Bates were the solo vocalists.

On April 30 there was an orchestral concert, at which Lady Speyer played the 'Zigeunerweisen' of Sarasate, and Mr. George Rathbone, formerly the Kendal choromaster, played for the first time with an orchestral accompaniment. I understand he has been studying recently with Mr. Isidor Cohn, in Manchester, and he is to be warmly complimented on his very successful début in such a concerto as Tchaikovsky's B flat minor.

The audiences have been large and almost wildly enthusiastic, and numerous courteous officials and stewards contributed greatly to one's comfort and enjoyment. The competitive side of the festival is dealt with in the Competition Festival Record.

DOVER MUSICAL FESTIVAL.

The fourth triennial musical festival was held in the Town Hall on Tuesday and Wednesday, May 3 and 4, under the auspices of the Dover Choral Union, of which Mr. H. J. Taylor (Borough organist) is the conductor. The recent festival has been better supported than on any past occasion, a considerable degree of interest being taken in the movement. No guarantors are sought, but the Society with its company of enthusiastic members provide a reserve fund to meet emergencies, and it is very satisfactory to note that the present season closed with a substantial balance in hand. The choir consisted of members of the Choral Union, and the orchestra (ably led by Mr. George Wilby) consisted of a contingent of experienced players from London, members of the Royal Artillery Band (Dover), members of the Dover Amateur Orchestral Society, and the leading professional players in the district.

The festival opened with Mendelssohn's 'Hymn of Praise.' The choruses were sung with splendid attack and tone, and the soloists were Madame Kaloola Atherton, Miss Marie Stiven and Mr. Frank Mullings. The first novelty was Dr. Hathaway's setting, as a choral rhapsody with orchestral accompaniment, of Browning's verses 'Master Hugues of Saxe-Gotha.' The work is a clever composition of a modern type, Dr. Hathaway appropriately making good use in the orchestral parts of the subject of Bach's great G minor Fugue. The orchestration is masterly, and the work received a good interpretation. Sir Frederick Bridge's 'Flag of England' was conducted by the composer, and the choir, orchestra and soloist (Madame Atherton) interpreted the work with evident enjoyment. The programme concluded with a vigorous rendering of 'The Triumph song' (H. J. Taylor) from the Dover Pageant music.

On May 4, Dr. Charlton Palmer's 'Casabianca,' set as a choral ballad with orchestral accompaniment, written for the occasion, was conducted by the composer. There is some very impressive and also spirited writing in this work, and the orchestration is brilliant. Another work composed for the occasion was the choral ballad 'The Eve of Waterloo,' a setting of Byron's words by H. J. Taylor. The story is full of interest, which suggests musical possibilities and the necessity for emotional singing, and gave opportunity for some excellent descriptive writing. The choir naturally sang at their best. Another new work, a Rhapsody for organ and orchestra, was composed and conducted by Mr. B. Luard-Selby. It is very tuneful throughout, with most effective tone-contrasts. Two part-songs were conducted by Mr. Louis N. Parker, entitled 'The silent land' and 'St. Valentine's Day.' The first-named is very impressive and beautiful, and the second of a light, madrigal-like character. The chief work of the evening, in which the choir revelled, was Sir Charles Stanford's 'Battle of the Baltic,' which was conducted by the composer. Special mention should be made of Mr. Frederick Ranalow's rendering of a fine song-cycle entitled 'A love story,' by Dr. Tom Haigh, which was accompanied by the composer.

It remains only to state that the choir and band did their work well, and the various composers named were in each case heartily recalled at the conclusion of their respective works, a specially hearty greeting being accorded to Mr. H. J. Taylor, the popular conductor of the festival.

TRINITY COLLEGE OF MUSIC.

The opening lecture of the new term course for the training of teachers was delivered by Dr. J. Warriner (University of London) on May 4, the subject being 'The Curse of the Musical Profession.' After tracing the origin and establishment of the 'close' professions, law, medicine, &c., and pointing out that individual wisdom often acted unwisely if engaged collectively, he said that it was doubtful how far the organization of specialists benefited Art, though the process might be necessary for the protection of the individual elements. Professional etiquette should be founded on ethics, and not on selfishness; the common good, not that of individuals. The ignorance, apathy and indifference of the general public is often made an excuse for a low standard of aim on the part of a teacher or artist, but such a policy in the long run defeated itself. 'The curse of the musical profession' lay in professionalising and degrading Art and in acting unfairly and ungenerously to others. He gave many instances of the various forms in which this was done, and suggested lines of action which would, he thought, benefit not only Art and the community, but also all its individual components.

SOME NOTES ON FORMER ORGANS AT ST. GEORGE'S CHAPEL, WINDSOR.

The November, 1909, number of the Musical Times contained an interesting account of St. George's Chapel, Windsor. It is with the intention of correcting and supplementing the remarks on the earlier organs in this building, and of reconciling some apparently conflicting statements and facts, that the following notes are offered.

The Dallam organ is not the earliest known. Rimbault mentions that Adam Fortress built an organ for St. George's in 1635, receiving £140 for his work.¹ This would be during the organistship of Dr. William Child, who held office from 1632 till 1697.

The Fortress organ was superseded by that built by Ralph Dallam in 1660. Rimbault states, 'The organ which Dallam built for the Royal Chapel at Windsor is still preserved in the church of St. Peter-in-the-East, St. Alban's. A representation of it may be seen in Ashmole's Order of the Garter.'²

According to Sir John Sutton,³ Father Smith built an organ for St. George's. Rimbault confirms this, and adds: 'This organ remained in the Royal Chapel until 1788; when the King, upon the completion of the new organ by Green, presented it to Old Windsor Church. It was afterwards removed to the New Church at Haggerstone, Middlesex, where it now is.'⁴ (The article in the Musical Times makes no mention of this organ by Father Smith, nor of Haggerstone.) This information is confirmed and amplified by Mr. T. Francis Bumpus, who states that when Old Windsor Church 'was rebuilt, about 1825, one portion of Father Schmidt's work was sent to the then newly-built church at Haggerstone and the other to a Dissenting chapel at Long Melford. The portion at Haggerstone still retains some of Schmidt's work, notably the wood-work, which is considered remarkably good. Upon the renovation of Haggerstone Church in 1861-62, the organ was removed from the West gallery, under the direction of Willis, and placed where we now see it, at the East end of the South aisle.'⁵ The case is modern and of no account.

⁵ 'London Churches, Ancient and Modern,' Series II, p. 99.

The organ now at St. Peter's Church, St. Albans, was purchased from the Church of St. Martin-in-the-Fields in 1725-26.⁶ Was the Dallam organ removed from St. George's to St. Martin's in order to make room for the one built by Father Smith for the former place? Rumour hath it so, and the authorities quoted above seem to agree, but Rimbault also states that Father Smith built an organ for St. Martin's in 1667.⁷ If this were so, it would be quite certain that the St. Peter's organ is not by Dallam but by Father Smith. Even more disturbing than this to the theory of the Dallam origin is the fact that the case of the St. Peter's organ is absolutely unlike that given in Ashmole, dated 1672, and reproduced in the Musical Times. (It should be noted that the two side-towers and connecting flats at St. Peter's are modern. They were added in 1894-95, when the organ was removed from the West gallery to the chancel. Originally the case consisted of three towers only, but there was a Choir organ case behind the organist.)

Fortunately, light is thrown upon the matter through the preservation of the specification of the organ as it existed prior to 1880. It was given in the course of an interesting letter on two old St. Albans organs, written by Mr. J. Harris, C.E., of Hemel Hempstead, and will be found in Musical Opinion for December, 1897. Here it is:

GREAT (GG to F).
	Feet.		Feet.
Open diapason ..	8	Sesquialtera, bass (3 ranks, to middle B) ..	—
Stopped diapason ..	8	Cornet, treble (3 ranks, from middle C up) ..	—

PEDAL (GGG to F, 23 notes).
Open diapason ..	16	Bourdon ..	16
COUPLERS.
Swell to Great.		Great to Pedal.
Three composition pedals.

A comparison of the specification of the original Dallam organ⁸ with that of the Great organ given above, shows that they are identical in all respects save only that the compass of the latter is more extended.⁹ The division of the chorus and trumpet stops at middle C is in itself almost sufficient to prove that the St. Peter's organ originally consisted of a single row of keys. All this points to the conclusion that many of the pipes and at least some of the mechanism of the Dallam organ formerly at St. George's Chapel, Windsor, subsequently found their way to St. Peter's Church, St. Albans, where they formed (and still form) part of the present instrument—and this via St. Martin-in-the-Fields.

But what about the external case, and the organ that Father Smith is said to have built for St. Martin's? The Musical Times quotes a statement to the effect that the Dallam organ 'in appearance and tone was said to resemble a Father Smith organ.' The latter portion of this statement may be taken as additional confirmation of Sutton and Rimbault in their ascription of the St. George's organ to Father Smith, but if the case referred to is the one in Ashmole's 'Order of the Garter' and reproduced in the Musical Times, it is obviously very far from the truth. Father Smith's usual type of case consisted of four towers with three intervening flats.¹⁰ When he departed from this it was by reducing the number of towers to three and of flats to two, still keeping the same Renaissance style, which was absolutely unlike that of the case under consideration.¹¹ It was seldom that he broke away from one or other of these two types, but the writer can recall three instances: the beautiful Renaissance case at St. Paul's, designed by Wren, the Gothic case at St. Mary's (University) Church, Oxford, and (for want of a better word) the 'Gothical' case at St. Albans Cathedral.¹² (It is quite possible that the two last-named cases are not the original ones, but that like the Gothic case at the Temple Church—which replaced one of Renaissance design in 1842—they were substituted in order to satisfy the craving, once so strong, for 'Gothic organ-cases in Gothic buildings.') The 1672 case might have been another exceptional case of Father Smith's, but is far more likely to have been the work of Ralph Dallam, inasmuch as it bears a strong family likeness to the beautiful West front of the organ at King's College, Cambridge, which was built in 1606 by Thomas Dallam, who, it is generally assumed, was Ralph's father.¹³

From the above mixture of facts and considerations the writer has little hesitation in drawing the following conclusions:

- (1.) That the pipes and mechanism (but not the case) of the organ built by Ralph Dallam in 1660 for St. George's Chapel, Windsor, were removed to St. Martin-in-the-Fields, London, in 1667, by Father Smith, who (almost certainly) added the case and (most probably) another, or even two manuals, and (possibly) extended the compass. This organ is now at St. Peter's Church, St. Albans.
- (2.) That in or about the year 1667, Father Smith put a new organ into Dallam's 1660 case, this organ also having a double remove, first to Old Windsor Church (in 1788) and subsequently one part to the Parish Church of St. Mary, Haggerstone, and the other to Long Melton.

In closing, mention should also be made of an organ built by Renatus Harris, though it almost certainly was not in St. George's, but in the King's private chapel. In 'Moneys received and paid for Secret Services of Charles II. and James II.' (1686-8), printed for the Camden Society, there is the following item:

'To René Harris, for fitting and repairing an organ for the chappell in Whitehall, and preparing an organ for the chappell at Windsor, and removing that organ from Winchester thither—£137 13.'¹⁴

ANDREW FREEMAN.

C. A. MACIRONE FUND.

A fund has been opened on behalf of the once well-known musician and composer, Clara Angela Macirone, now very aged and in straitened circumstances. Her annual concert in the old Hanover Square Rooms, where a brilliant group of artists would gather to help the interpretation of her varied compositions, vocal and instrumental, are delightful memories of the middle decades of last century. Her part-songs still hold a place in choral societies' répertoires.

Generous donations and subscriptions have been received and are gratefully acknowledged from:—Madame Argenti, Mrs. Beavington Atkinson, Sir Frederick Bridge, Miss Du Bois, Rev. J. E. Carpenter, R. Forbes Carpenter, Esq., Miss C. L. Frapp, Mrs. Galbraith, Dr. G. King Martyr, Messrs. Novello & Co., Miss Paine, Miss E. Paine, Miss F. Paine, W. W. Paine, Esq., Mrs. Phipps, Mrs. Powell, Sir Herbert N. Thompson.

Contributions can be paid direct into the 'C. A. Macirone Fund,' London County and Westminster Bank, Kensington Palace Branch, and will be duly acknowledged.

⁶ It was presented to St. Peter's by Christopher Pache, M.D. Alterations and additions were made by Godman, a local builder, about 1880, but it remained a G organ till it was removed to the chancel, when it was 'converted' to C compass by Kirkland.

⁷ H. & R., p. 116.

⁸ See Musical Times for November, 1909; also Grove's 'Dictionary of Music' (revised edition), vol. iii, p. 532.

¹⁰ Examples may be found at Trinity College, Cambridge (side towers and flats have been added since Father Smith's time), St. Mary the Great, Cambridge; St. Peter-ad-Vincula, Tower of London (removed from the Chapel Royal, Whitehall); St. Mary-at-Hill; St. Clement Dane's, Strand (since somewhat altered); Christ Church, Oxford, &c.

¹¹ Such as St. Peter's, Cornhill, and the small Choir organ at Manchester Cathedral.

¹² See Musical Times for October, 1909. This organ was formerly at St. Dunstan-in-the-East, London, and is now in St. Lawrence's Church, Bradford (Essex).

¹³ This West front, as unique as it is beautiful, is totally different from the equally beautiful East front. May not the similarity in the styles of the buildings—for King's is as fine a specimen of Perpendicular Gothic as St. George's—have led Ralph to take his father's organ case as a model?

CHORAL UNIONS.

Every spring brings evidence of the efficient progressive work carried out in the choral classes of the L. C. C. Evening Continuation Schools. Contingents are sent by the schools to unite in forming six Choral Unions, each of which gives an annual concert. The movement, which is increasing, forms a school for the training of choralists, of which musical London outside educational circles has scant knowledge. The work carried on in the past winter has resulted in excellent performances of exacting works.

The Battersea, Clapham and Wandsworth Choral Union, directed by Mr. George Lane, performed a selection from 'Judas Maccabæus' and Dr. Hugh Blair's 'Trafalgar,' at Battersea Town Hall on April 19. The complexities of the latter work gave them no great trouble, and aided by a well-trained orchestra mostly drawn from the schools, they carried out their task with excellent effect. The programme also included part-songs.

The West London Choral Union gave Mr. Hamish MacCunn's 'The lay of the last minstrel,' under the direction of Mr. W. T. Oke, at Queen's Hall on April 21. The orchestra, largely amateur, led by Mr. T. J. Milne, co-operated with the choir in producing a picturesque reading of this 'modernistic' score, of which the difficulties were apparent. Haydn's 'Come, gentle spring' and 'God of light,' and Elgar's 'I am the god Thor' were the chief items in the miscellaneous programme.

The gigantic Hackney and Finsbury Choral Union, which chose the Alexandra Palace as their meeting-place and Mr. Allen Gill as their conductor, were heard on April 23 in Act II. of Gluck's 'Orpheus' and, to better advantage, in Mendelssohn's '42nd Psalm.' Mr. Gill's experience of choral music-making on a large scale enabled him to secure impressive effects in Mendelssohn's choruses, and expressive effects in the part-songs that followed.

The small but lively North-West London Choral Union met on April 23 at the Northern Polytechnic, Holloway Road, and gave a spirited account of the concert-version of Gounod's 'Faust.' Both in this and in Dudley Buck's 'Hymn to music,' Gounod's 'By Babylon's wave' and other smaller numbers, the vitality and conspicuously good tone of the singing were always noticeable, and offered a cause for congratulation to the conductor, Mr. H. P. Dakin.

The programme that was effectively carried out by the Lambeth Choral Union at the Surrey Masonic Hall on April 29, under the direction of Mr. Charles Metcalf, included Frederick Cliffe's 'Ode to the north-east wind' and Sir Frederick Bridge's 'The ballad of the Clampherdown.'

The South-East London Choral Union persevered with their concert on the evening of May 7, and attracted a good audience. A selection from 'Judas Maccabæus' and Hamish MacCunn's 'The wreck of the Hesperus' were the chief features of the programme. They were sung with spirit, good tone and precision. Among the smaller numbers the Epilogue from Elgar's 'The Banner of St. George' and Walmisley's 'Music all powerful' deserve special mention on account of the admirable interpretations given. Mr. Arthur G. Gibbs conducted ably.

Sullivan's opera, 'Princess Ida,' was performed under the auspices of the London Academy of Music at the Hampstead Conservatoire on May 24 (postponed from May 10). The Students of the Operatic choir (conductor, Mr. Henry Beauchamp) and orchestra (conductor, Mr. René Ortmans) of the Academy, gave ample evidence of the excellent training received at the institution by the spirited rendering of the choruses and orchestration of the opera. Many of the principals also displayed considerable ability, those deserving of special mention being Mr. Arthur Durand (King Gama), Mr. Llewellyn Thomas (Hilarion), Mr. Stanley Evans (Cyril), Mr. Reginald Johnson (Florian), Miss Queenie Watt (Princess Ida), Miss Nellie Addison (Lady Blanche), Miss Althea Barnard (Melissa), and Miss Margerite Thomson (Lady Psyche). The stage management was in the hands of Mr. Henry F. Corbin, and Mr. Henry Beauchamp conducted, with his customary energy and ability, a highly successful performance which reflected much credit on the Academy.

London Concerts.

MR. ROBERT POLLAK'S CONCERT: QUEEN'S HALL, MAY 3.

Mr. Pollak is a violinist of marked ability. In Mozart's Concerto in A he exhibited insight into the beauty of the music, and he played with much grace and purity. A novelty in his programme was a new Violin concerto in C minor, composed by M. Jaques-Dalcroze, a Swiss musician who has made his name known by his admirable system of evolving rhythm by bodily movements. The new work, which was conducted by the composer, is a symphonic poem which is cast in two main sections. The first part is intended to depict the soul of an artist who bewails the fate of neglect. It contains some striking musical ideas, and the orchestral combinations have attractive colour, but the doleful mood is prolonged to the point of monotony. The second part reflects the reaction of joy at the creation of an art work. Here the composer utilises his sensitiveness to rhythmic effect, and his music becomes very interesting. Mr. Pollak played the solo, which is often in the form of a dialogue with the orchestra, with almost passionate expression. He seemed to be endeavouring to make the violin articulate. Other items in the programme were Beethoven's overture to 'Fidelio,' and the 'Introduction et Rondo Capriccioso' for violin and orchestra (Op. 28) by Saint-Saëns. Miss Edith Clegg sang, and Dr. Frederick Cowen conducted all the items except the Dalcroze concerto.

At Queen's Hall, on May 3, the London Welsh Choral Society gave—not for the first time—a performance of Elgar's 'Caractacus.' Mr. Merlin Morgan obtained a vigorous reading of the score from the orchestra, and an interpretation of the choral sections that was in many places admirable. The lady choralists showed greater freedom and proficiency than the males; in the matter of tone all parts were well supported. The outstanding feature of the performance was the work of the soloists. Mr. Thorpe Bates was vocally and dramatically admirable as Caractacus; Miss Laura Evans-Williams as Eigen and Mr. Cynllys Gibbs as Orbin ably seconded his efforts, and Mr. David Evans sang efficiently as the Arch Druid and Claudius. The concert opened with Parry's 'The Pied Piper of Hamelin,' in which the choir showed excellent drill.

The programme offered by the Handel Society for their concert at Queen's Hall on May 4 was, as usual, devoted to the deserving and unfamiliar. Dr. Walford Davies's solemn and thoughtful setting of Milton's 'Ode on Time,' for chorus and orchestra, received an impressive interpretation. A complete contrast to its mood was provided by Dvorák's almost lively 'Te Deum.' A further change of style and atmosphere was introduced by Mr. Gustav von Holst's ballad 'King Estmere.' The purely orchestral numbers were Dvorák's 'Mein Heim' overture and Handel's Grand Concerto for strings (No. 9), in F major. Madame Le Mar and Mr. William Higley were the vocalists, and Mr. Coleridge-Taylor conducted.

The Queen's Hall Orchestra gave an 'In Memoriam' concert on May 19. The programme included the 'Trauermarsch' from 'Götterdämmerung,' Mozart's Masonic Funeral March, Mr. Wood's arrangement of Chopin's Funeral March, and Tchaikovsky's 'Pathetic Symphony.' Madame Ada Crossley sang 'O rest in the Lord.' On May 23 the programme was repeated with the addition of Rudyard Kipling's 'The dead King,' recited by Lady Beerbohm Tree.

Mr. Henry Bird's Jubilee concert, which was held on April 26 at the Queen's Hall, was a great success, and bore witness to the popularity of this well-known musician, a sketch of whose life and a portrait were given in our last issue. Among the artists who assisted on this occasion were Madame Agnes Nicholls, Madame Ada Crossley, Miss Evangeline Florence, Miss May Harrison, Sir Charles Santley, Mr. Ben Davies, Mr. Plunket Greene, Mr. Kennerley Rumford, Mr. Leonard Borwick and Mr. Hamilton Hart.

English music supplied the bulk of the programme chosen by the Schwiller Quartet for their concert at Bechstein Hall on May 18. They played with admirable finish and sympathy a highly meritorious Quartet in C minor (No. 4) by Mr. J. B. McEwen, and Mr. Balfour Gardiner's Quartet in B flat in one movement. Dr. Vaughan Williams's song-cycle 'On Wenlock edge' was expressively sung by Mr. Gervase Elwes, accompanied by Mr. J. Brath (at the pianoforte) and the Quartet. The members of the Quartet are Messrs. Isidore Schwiller, Ernest Simpson (violin), Arthur Fossati (viola), and Jean Schwiller (violinello).

RECITALS.

Miss Constance Keeping showed considerable technical ability as a pianist at her recital at Æolian Hall on April 26 (evening). The most interesting part of her programme was that which she carried out in conjunction with Mr. Tom Fussell (violinist). It consisted of the sonatas for violin and pianoforte by César Franck and Richard Strauss, Op. 18. Mr. Fussell played with notable skill and warmth of expression.

M. André de Ribapierre, who is a violinist with a widely developed technique, made his first appearance in London at Æolian Hall on April 26 (afternoon), and achieved considerable success in a programme that included Bruch's 'Fantasie Ecossaise' and Bach's 'Chaconne.' Mr. Stuart Edwards (vocalist) also took part in the recital.

The second and third of the recitals given by Messrs. Ysaye and Pugno took place at Queen's Hall on April 27 and May 4. At the former the programme consisted of Beethoven's violin and pianoforte Sonatas Op. 23, Op. 24, Op. 30 (Nos. 1 and 2). At the latter, Op. 30 (No. 3) and Op. 96 were given, thus completing the cycle, and the 'Kreutzer' Sonata, played at the first recital, was repeated. Of the wonderful unity and finish of their execution and the appropriateness of their expression it is unnecessary to speak. The series has provided authoritative and model interpretations of every movement in the Sonatas.

Miss Kathleen Chabot (pianist) and Madame Ada Davies (vocalist) were the artists appearing at the Chappell 'Matinée vocal' on April 28. A recital was given by Miss Audrey Hyslop (pianist) and Mr. Hugh Langton on April 29. On the same day Signor Aldo Antonietti showed the breadth of his sympathies in giving a violin recital. The three last mentioned concerts took place at the Æolian Hall. At Bechstein Hall on April 30, Miss Evangeline Florence and Miss Irene Scharrer gave a recital before a crowded audience. Mr. Cecil Baumer's programme of pianoforte pieces, which he executed with vigour, at Æolian Hall, on the same day, included Brahms's first Sonata.

Flute recitals would be more frequent and welcome if gifts such as those of Mr. de Jong were commoner. A programme that must be described as long in the case of a solo wind-instrument, was carried out by him at Steinway Hall on May 2 without any trace of monotony. His fluent execution was best exhibited in a Sonata for flute and pianoforte by John Francis Barnett.

At Bechstein Hall, on May 2, Miss Julia Hostater brought forward an exceedingly varied collection of songs and interpreted them with considerable feeling and vocal power. On the same day Herr Richard Buhlig gave his second pianoforte recital at Steinway Hall, again eliciting admiration for the deftness and lucidity of his playing; and at Salle Erard, Mr. Jan Mulder, with the assistance of Mr. Louis Zimmermann, Mr. Walthew and other capable artists, gave a chamber concert with a highly interesting programme that included a Quintet in B flat for clarinet and strings by Mr. Zimmermann. Recitals were given on May 3 by Miss Marie Dubois (pianist) at Æolian Hall, and M. Boga Oumiroff (vocalist) at Bechstein Hall; both showed skill and insight in their performances. But the most interesting event of the day was the concert of French music given at Bechstein Hall in the evening by Mlles. Germaine Sanderson de Crowe, Yvonne Astruc and Ninette Chassaing, who are vocalist, violinist and pianist respectively, and all highly gifted.

The folk-song recital in costume, though increasing in vogue, belongs yet to the region of the unconventional, and no stereotyped methods have arisen. Full play was given to their individuality and ingenuity by Miss Esmé Hubbard, who gave such a recital at Steinway Hall on May 3, and by Miss Beatrice Dunn and Mr. Clive Carey, who gave a similar recital at Æolian Hall on May 4. In both cases the result was picturesque and fully artistic.

On May 4 a recital was given at Steinway Hall by Miss Edith Wynne-Agabeg, who possesses a voice of fine quality, and Miss Winfred Thompson, an excellent reciter. At Salle Erard, Miss Elena Clarke gave her first violin recital.

Madame Ida Reman again exemplified her versatility and her warmly expressive style in giving her second recital at Bechstein Hall on May 5. Her list of songs included examples of Bach, Scarlatti, Marcello, Schmitt, Schubert, Brahms, Saint-Saëns, Fauré, Dalcroze and Debussy. Madame Reman was assisted by Madame Wurmser-Delcourt (harpist). At the same hall in the evening, Mademoiselle Yvonne de St. André gave pleasure with her interpretations of Greek and Breton folk-songs. M. Jean Gerardy's violoncello recital took place with success at Bechstein Hall on May 6; his programme consisted of works by Corelli, Bach, Boccherini and Haydn.

At the recital given by Herr Moriz Rosenthal at Queen's Hall, on May 18, Chopin's B flat minor Sonata was specially included in the programme. The audience stood during the performance of the Funeral March, and received it without applause. A noteworthy item was an unfamiliar and interesting Sonata in B flat by the late Danish composer Ludwig Schytte. Betraying to some extent the influence of Grieg and of Edmund Neupert, a composer almost unknown in England, this work contains much beautiful music, written with a consummate knowledge of the capabilities of the pianoforte. Herr Rosenthal also gave a wonderful interpretation of Albeniz's tone-picture 'Triana.' In music by Schumann and Chopin the familiar firmness and delicacy of Herr Rosenthal's playing were again conspicuous. The virtuoso piece of the occasion was the pianist's own Fantasia on the 'Blue Danube' waltz.

The brilliant powers and magical touch that belong to M. de Pachmann, and to no other pianist, were displayed at a Chopin recital in Queen's Hall, on May 21, with the familiar and expected musical results, and produced the customary effect upon a number of people in the audience. His interpretations were generally very charming, but were perhaps more than ever marred by his mannerisms.

Songs by Schubert, Brahms, Jensen and Wolf made up the programme of Miss Elena Gerhardt's recital at Bechstein Hall on May 21. Herr Nikisch was the accompanist, and the expectations of the admirers of both artists were fully realised. Miss Gerhardt's grasp of all the essentials and adornments of the art of Lieder singing was manifested in the most complete and convincing manner.

Suburban Concerts.

At the People's Palace, Mile End, on April 23, the Choral and Orchestral Society conducted by Mr. Frank Idle, gave a concert performance of Gounod's 'Faust.' The choir sang with dramatic insight. The accompaniments were played by an orchestra of fifty, led by Mr. George Wilby. The soloists were Miss Jenny Taggart, Miss Marie Stiven, Mr. Henry Beaumont, Mr. Arthur Rose and Mr. Harry Dearth. The audience, numbering over 3,000, was most appreciative.

Mr. Edwin Bending gave a successful concert on April 28 at the Hampstead Conservatoire, when Haydn's 'Spring' was excellently performed by the choir and orchestra. The former were also heard in Macfarren's 'Orpheus with his lute' and Pearsall's 'My bonny lass,' and the latter in Mendelssohn's 'Ruy Blas' overture and Elgar's 'Pomp and Circumstance' march. Both choral and orchestral forces reflected much credit on the training received from their conductor, Mr. Edwin Bending. Miss Bertha Oppenheimer, Mr. Vincent Hards and Mr. Reginald Gates were the solo vocalists, Miss Florence Smith played Weber's 'Concertstück,' and Miss Adelina Dinelli gave Grieg's 'Elegiac melody' and 'Solveig's Lied' for violin. Recitations were contributed by Mr. Charles Fry.

Sullivan's 'Golden Legend' was performed in the Great Central Hall, Bermondsey, on April 28, by the combined choral and orchestral societies of Bermondsey Settlement and Hither Green, under the efficient direction of Dr. John E. Borland. The associated choirs numbered 250 performers and displayed fine tone and excellent expression. Miss Jennie Taggart, Madame Cecil Vicars, Mr. Samuel Masters, Mr. James Crewes and Mr. Daniel Price were the solo vocalists. Sir George Martin's festival anthem 'Hail, gladdening Light,' conducted by the composer, and the Introduction to Act 3 of 'Lohengrin' were also performed.

The second concert of the season by the Brockley and Lewisham Orchestral Society took place at St. Peter's Hall, Brockley, on April 28, when the programme included Mendelssohn's 'Hebrides' and 'Midsummer Night's Dream' overtures, Beethoven's Symphony No. 1 (in C), and MacCunn's Suite 'Highland Memories.' These were well played under the conductorship of Mr. Frederic Leeds. The solo vocalists were Miss Gladys Honey and Mr. Harry Dearth, and Mr. Ernest Holden played Bargiel's Adagio (Op. 38) for violoncello and orchestra.

Sir Frederick Bridge gave an interesting lecture on 'Milton' at the Kensington Town Hall on May 2, when the illustrations consisted chiefly of the music to the 'Masque of Comus,' by William and Henry Lawes and others. These were well rendered by the English Ladies' Orchestral Society, conducted by Mr. J. S. Liddle, with Miss Gertrude Sichel and Mr. Graham Smart as vocalists. The madrigal 'Fair Oran,' by John Milton, senr., was played by the orchestra quite in accordance with tradition, as Sir Frederick stated, when no choir was available.

The Willesden Green and Cricklewood Choral Society, conducted by Mr. F. W. Belchamber, gave a successful performance of Berlioz's 'Faust' at the Hampstead Conservatoire on May 4. The choir and orchestra, led by Mr. Henry R. Starr, and with Dr. Davan Wetton at the organ, numbered 130 performers. The solo vocalists were Miss Mabel Manson, Mr. Frank Tebbutt, Mr. Frank Moody and Mr. Arthur Barlow.

The Fulham and District Choral Society concluded its fifth season at the Fulham Town Hall on May 5, when a concert performance of Gounod's 'Faust' was given. Under the able conductorship of Mr. George Wilby the choir and orchestra, led by Mr. Edgar Wilby, acquitted themselves admirably. The solo vocalists were Miss Euneta Truscott, Miss Mabel Todd, Mr. Alfred Heather, Mr. Montague Borwell and Mr. Aubrey Millward.

The Orpheus Choral Society, conducted by Mr. Claud Powell, gave their third concert of the season at the Hampstead Conservatoire on May 5. The programme comprised old madrigals and part-songs by Dowland, Thomas Morley, W. Byrd, Dr. Hayes, J. Savile, Samuel Webbe, Atterbury, Dean Alrich and John Benet; modern part-music was represented by Walford Davies, C. H. H. Parry, Elgar and Stanford. The orchestra played Walford Davies's 'Solemn melody' for strings and organ, and the combined forces were heard in Wagner's 'Apotheose des Hans Sachs,' from the third act of 'Die Meistersinger.' The solo artists were Miss Marguerite Owen and Mr. S. Harold Dowsing (vocalists), Miss Dorothy Bridson (violin), Miss Mary Bridson (violoncello), Miss Ivy Parkin (pianoforte) and Mr. Leonard K. Boseley (organ).

The Upper Hornsey Road Choral Society gave a concert at St. John's Institute, Holloway Road, on May 5, in aid of the Great Northern Hospital. The programme included Bishop's 'Now by day's retiring lamp,' Macfarren's 'The three fishers,' Weekles's 'In pride of May,' Pinsuti's 'Good-night, beloved,' Sullivan's 'The long day closes,' Fanning's 'Song of the Vikings,' and Mendelssohn's 'Hear my prayer.' Mr. H. Smith conducted. During the interval there was a display of Old English games and dances by the Ambler Road Girls' School.

MUSIC IN DURBAN, SOUTH AFRICA.

The new Town Hall was opened on April 12 by his Excellency General The Right Hon. Lord Methuen. The proceedings began with the performance of a new 'Civic March' for organ and orchestra, composed for the occasion by the Borough organist. A special festival choir and orchestra of 330 performers sang the choruses 'The heavens are telling' ('Creation') and 'Hallelujah' ('Messiah'), and a 'Hymn of dedication,' produced for the occasion by Messrs. A. Mulligan and J. F. Proudman. The same choir and orchestra gave the first choral and orchestral concert in the new Hall on the next evening (April 13), when the programme included Mendelssohn's Symphony-cantata the 'Hymn of Praise,' Wagner's 'Tannhäuser' march, Dudley Buck's 'Hymn to music,' and Beethoven's 'Emperor' concerto (first movement), by Miss Bertha Feinhols and orchestra. The soloists were Miss Elsie Purvis, Miss Agnes Fyfe and Mr. Harold Payne; principal violin, Mr. F. Israel, and organist, Rev. M. O. Hodson. On April 14, the Mayor and Mayoress (Mr. and Mrs. Walter Greenacre) entertained about 1,200 invited guests with dancing, refreshments and music, the last-named sharing the usual fate at such gatherings. On April 15, a choir of 400 children, selected in small numbers from the various schools, gave a festival concert, singing unison and two-part songs. Swedish drill by cadets, club-swinging by girls, and Mr. L. Mancini's violin band of boys added interest and variety to the proceedings. On April 16, the Mayor gave away thousands of souvenir mugs to the Durban children in Albert Park, where he had organized 'sports' for the little ones. The festival week concluded on the evening of April 16 with the Borough organist's annual concert. The programme included ballads by Miss Ethel Moon, Miss Inez Mackenzie, Mr. H. J. Hamlin and Mr. E. Heselton; selections such as Grieg's 'Peer Gynt' suite No. 1, by the band of the 2nd Battalion Duke of Cornwall's Light Infantry, conducted by Mr. W. T. Roberts; solo pianoforte, Liszt's 'Elegie,' played by Miss Bertha Feinhols; Squire's 'Tarantelle' for violoncello, played by Mr. Clifford Foster; and the well-known glees, 'By Celia's arbour,' 'On the ramparts,' and 'A Franklin's Dogge,' by the Durban Gleemen. All the music during the week was organized and conducted (except where otherwise stated) by Mr. J. Frank Proudman, musical director to the Corporation and Borough organist.

MUSIC IN VIENNA.

(BY OUR SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT.)

Vienna, May 15, 1910.

The fiftieth anniversary of the Philharmonic Concerts was celebrated with brilliant festivities. Bruckner's 'Te Deum' and Beethoven's ninth Symphony figured in the programme of the Jubilee concert (matinée) given on April 24. The Philharmonic Orchestra was on this occasion worthily assisted by Mesdames Eliza and Hilgermann and Messrs. Maikl and Mayr, all members of the Imperial Opera, and by the Singverein of the Kaiserl. Königl. Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde, which was augmented by members of the Männergesangsverein.

Additional splendour was lent to the occasion by the presence of the Emperor, who came with the Archduke Rainer. His Majesty, greeted on his entrance with the national anthem, received an enthusiastic ovation. Director von Weingartner and the orchestra were of course very much fêted. On the next day a reception, attended by many deputations, took place at the Rathaus, and was followed in the evening by a banquet. The members of the Philharmonic Orchestra received tokens of honour and diplomas from the Emperor and the corporation, and presents and addresses in large numbers arrived from near and far.

At the Court Opera a new ballet, 'Mondweibchen,' was recently produced. Herr Regel was responsible for the book, while the direction of the dances was in the hands of Herr Hassreiter, the costumes were designed by the painter Herr Goltz, and Herr Richard Goldberg wrote the pleasing and effectively scored music. It is not unlikely that this new work, which was very well received, may remain permanently in the répertoire.

The prospects of the Volksoper are unfortunately very gloomy. Director Simons, who for a space of years has kept the institution up to a high artistic standard, finds himself obliged to suspend the opera performances owing to the increased pecuniary demands of the orchestra and chorus. In the future the theatre will be given up to musical comedy and spectacular displays. This state of affairs has caused much dissatisfaction, and the Corporation are said to be considering the advisability of lending their support in order to save the situation.

Music in the Provinces.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENTS.)

BIRMINGHAM.

The Carl Rosa Opera Company gave a magnificent revival of Goldmark's spectacular opera 'The Queen of Sheba' (first produced in Vienna, March 10, 1875), at the Grand Theatre, Wolverhampton, on April 25. Strange to say, Wolverhampton is more fortunate than Birmingham, for within a few weeks 'Samson and Delilah' was presented there by the Moody-Manners Opera Company, and then again 'The Queen of Sheba' by the Carl Rosa Opera Company, whilst the great centre of the Midlands is completely ignored, the touring opera companies giving Birmingham a wide berth. The opera was magnificently staged, and the performance was notable for the fine playing of the orchestra and the artistic singing of the chorus and principals, the latter including Miss Beatrice Miranda, Miss Doris Woodall, Miss Annie van Dyck, and Messrs. Walter Wheatley, Charles Victor and Alexander Richard. The opera was conducted by Mr. Eugene Goossens.

In connection with the Midland School of Music, Mr. Arthur Cooke gave in the large Lecture Theatre of that institution, on April 30, the fifth pianoforte recital of a series of six, the whole programme being devoted to compositions by Liszt. The most interesting item proved to be Liszt's rarely-heard Sonata in B minor, a remarkably expressive work in one extended movement, although comprising various sections, the whole being knit together in an unbroken unity. Its exposition was poetical in the extreme, and one has rarely heard Mr. Cooke to greater advantage. He further played the Chant Polonoise No. 2, in G minor, the well-known 'Liebestraum,' the sixth 'Hungarian Rhapsody,' the 'Mazeppa' study and another study of great difficulty, achieving a veritable triumph. The vocal items comprised three rather poor examples of Liszt's songs, given by Miss May Ford.

With the exception of the Theatre Royal Promenade Concerts, which began on May 23, and will be extended to three weeks as usual, our local season is practically at an end. Special interest is attached to the visit of Sir Hubert Parry and Sir Edward Elgar, which will give a distinct cachet to these concerts. Sir Hubert Parry will conduct his New Symphony in E minor, and Sir Edward Elgar his 'Enigma variations,' the Funeral March and incidental music from 'Grania and Diarmid,' and one of the 'Pomp and Circumstance' Marches. Mr. Landon Ronald, who is the conductor-in-chief will, however, direct Sir Edward Elgar's Symphony on the Elgar night. These concerts are again under the direction of Mr. Max Mossel.

Mr. Howard Hadley, who a short time ago was appointed one of the pianoforte teachers of the Royal Academy of Music, and who is about to proceed to Australia and New Zealand as examiner for the Associated Boards of the Royal Academy of Music and the Royal College of Music, gave an interesting pianoforte recital in connection with the Royal Society of Artists' Musical Matinees on April 30. The programme was well chosen, and included the now rarely-heard 'Variations Sérieuses' by Mendelssohn, in which the performer appeared at his best. Mr. Hadley is not an emotional pianist, nor can he be classed among the 'Sturm und Drang' school, but his playing is always scholarly and musically, and it is quite a pleasure to listen to him.

BOURNEMOUTH.

Elgar's 'The Dream of Gerontius' was performed at the Winter Gardens on April 26. The oratorio had already been given here last year, so the townsfolk had enjoyed some experience of its beauties. Madame Newling's choir sang the music with insight, but narrowly escaped disaster in the exacting 'Demon' chorus. The playing of the Municipal Orchestra was magnificent, and Mr. Allan Biggs did useful work at the organ. Madame Amy Dewhurst sang the music of the Angel. Mr. Gervase Elwes again undertook the music of Gerontius, and Mr. Pedro de Zulueta, who sang the music allotted to the Priest and the Angel of the Agony, struggled manfully against indisposition. The performance was under Mr. Dan Godfrey's conductorship.

At the Symphony Concert, on April 28, a Violin concerto in C minor (Op. 14), by the Scandinavian violinist, Tor Aulin, was performed for the first time. The work, though full of difficulties, is extremely well written from the soloist's point of view. The nationality of the composer makes itself felt in the music, albeit certain figures and rhythms bear a close resemblance to those of a Slavonic type. The work is not, perhaps, of great originality, but compensation is to be found in the abundance of its melody, which is always refined. The solo portion was played most artistically by Mr. Hans Wessely.

A Sinfonietta for flute, oboe, two clarinets, two bassoons and two horns by Novacek was played for the first time in England at the Classical Concert on May 2. It is a clever and pleasing work, and it was capably performed by members of the Municipal Orchestra.

The Classical Concert (the last of the winter season) on May 9, had for its notable feature the production of a new overture by Edith Swepstone entitled 'The horn of Roland.' The music is decidedly interesting and attractive.

On May 11, at a violin and pianoforte recital given by Mr. Harry Farjeon and Miss Ivy Angove (assisted by Miss Xenia Beaver), a new pianoforte work by the first-named artist was played for the first time, the composer himself, of course, being the interpreter. The work is called 'From the three-cornered kingdom,' and comprises five little sketches. The pieces are written on modern lines, and so far they are fairly successful efforts. The composer played his new work very neatly.

At the second extra Symphony Concert (the last of the season), on May 12, a work new to an English audience was brought forward: this was a Rhapsodie Javanaise (Op. 7), by Dirk Schafer, a Dutchman. It is quite a brilliant piece of writing and highly attractive; the orchestration is exceptionally clever. Mr. Dan Godfrey and his capital orchestra are to be congratulated on the very successful performance.

The Orpheus Glee Society gave a concert in Holy Trinity Hall on May 4, in aid of the Royal Victoria Hall, when Van Bree's 'St. Cecilia's Day' was the chief feature of the programme. Bishop's glee 'Now tramp,' Sir Frederick Bridge's 'The gossings' and Sullivan's 'The long day closes' were also performed. The choir, under the conductorship of Mr. Herbert J. Nash, and assisted by the boys of Holy Trinity choir, sang excellently throughout. Miss Spacey was the solo vocalist, and able assistance was given at the pianoforte by Mrs. Kemmis-Betty and Mr. C. E. Hebblewhite.

BRISTOL AND BATH.

A concert was given at the Victoria Rooms, Clifton, on April 27, under the direction of Mr. George Riseley, when the orchestra played effectively Beethoven's C minor Symphony, the Allegro from Tchaikovsky's sixth Symphony, and the 'Finlandia' of Sibelius. Miss Winifred Davy contributed with charm, pianoforte solos, and Miss Allys Gear was the vocalist.

St. Matthew's Choir gave their second annual concert on April 28 at Redland Park Hall with an orchestra led by Mr. Edwin Jacobs, and with Mr. Arthur Lee as accompanist. The chief feature of the programme was Mendelssohn's 'Lauda Sion,' which was well rendered. The soloists were Mrs. Lanham, Miss M. Lockey, Mrs. Thomas, Mr. G. W. McGregor and Mr. M. Thomas. Mr. A. H. Tocknell conducted.

The Broad Plain House Choir, on May 11, held their thirteenth annual concert at which extracts from Sullivan's 'Golden Legend' and Mendelssohn's 'O come, let us worship' were given. The soloists were Miss Edna Keen, Miss Ada Bennett, Mr. Lionel Venn and Mr. Thomas. There was an orchestra led by Mr. H. H. Dennis, Mr. J. E. Seaton was at the organ, and Mr. W. Vaughan Jenkins conducted.

On May 5, at the Pump Room, Bath, there were two interesting concerts: in the afternoon, some favourite orchestral compositions were performed under the direction of Mr. George Riseley; in the evening, the Bath Society of Gleemen (Mr. Algernon Salter, conductor) sang several part-songs. The soloists in 'The Image of the Rose' and in 'Sad Autumn winds' (arranged by G. Riseley) were Mr. Ford Packer and Mr. F. Horsell.

DEVON.

The first performance of an operetta 'St. George and the Dragon,' by Mr. David Parkes, was given at an Elizabethan Pageant in Plymouth Guildhall on April 20. The music was of an exceptionally high standard, with several representative themes which were combined in the Finale with great skill. The operetta was excellently performed under the direction of the composer and Mr. W. Kilpatrick. Mr. A. C. Faull, on May 18, reopened an organ in Courtenay Street Congregational Church, Plymouth, which had been enlarged at a cost of £125.

The Torquay Musical Association gave a choral and orchestral concert on April 20, when the programme comprised Parry's 'Blest pair of Sirens,' Dvorák's 'Te Deum,' and Schumann's Pianoforte concerto in A (Op. 54). Solo by Mrs. W. H. Mortimer. The solo vocalists were Miss Perceval Allen and Mr. Joseph Farrington, and Mr. T. Henry Webb conducted a successful performance.

The Teignmouth Choral Association gave a performance of 'Elijah' on April 21, the choir numbering nearly one hundred voices. Mr. E. G. Pridham conducted, with Mr. P. Mansfield at the organ. On April 28, the Orchestral Society at Teignmouth, consisting of thirty-three performers and conducted by Mr. Albert J. James, played Beethoven's Symphony No. 1 and Sterndale Bennett's overture 'The wood nymphs,' with pieces by Gounod and Whitney. The vocalist, Miss Barbara Battishill, was accompanied by Miss E. Cook Creedy, who also collaborated with Mr. C. G. Pike in Boellmann's 'Variations Symphoniques' for violoncello and pianoforte. The amalgamated choral societies at Exeter, the Western Counties Musical Association and the Exeter Oratorio Society, sang Gounod's 'The Redemption' on the afternoon of April 27, conducted by Dr. D. J. Wood. In the evening Stanford's 'The Revenge' and Coleridge-Taylor's 'Bon-bon' choral Suite were given, the former conducted by Dr. H. J. Edwards, who received an ovation on his re-appearance after his recent long illness. The choir numbered nearly three hundred, and though intonation and attack were not so good as they might have been, the singing showed many good points, especially in the evening. The principal vocalists were Miss Norah Newport, Miss Verena Fancourt, Miss Christine Birkett, Mr. Alfred Heather and Mr. Julien Henry. The band, largely local, was one of the best of its kind heard in Exeter for some time. A tribute was paid standing to the memory of the late Mr. John Pardew, who had been leader of these concerts for many years. Mr. Henry Gibson, of the New Symphony Orchestra, was the leader on this occasion.

The Exeter Orchestral Society, conducted by Dr. Wood, gave its final concert for the season on May 4, playing the 'Pastoral Symphony,' Cowen's 'Language of the Flowers,' Sullivan's 'Overture di Ballo,' and Slavonic dances by Dvorák. The vocalist was Miss Christine Birkett.

The ambitious Amateur Operatic Society at Kingsbridge appeared in 'The Yeomen of the Guard' on April 26 and following days. The stage business was not quite smart enough, but the singing of principals and chorus was, generally speaking, excellent. The principal parts were played by Miss Elsie Lidstone, Elsie; Miss Edith Fellow, Phoebe; Mr. H. Monson, the Lieutenant; Mr. W. H. Reeves, Fairfax; and Mr. Robson, Point. Mr. W. Beer conducted, and Messrs. W. J. R. Colley and J. R. Gill were managers. Mrs. Harford Thompson organized a very successful concert at Tavistock on May 4 in aid of the Red Cross Society, having obtained the assistance of a talented concert party consisting of Madame Beatrice Langley (violin), Miss May Mukle (violoncello), Mr. Haddon Squire (pianoforte), and Mr. Stanley Newman (vocalist).

DUBLIN.

During the week commencing May 16, Mr. Robert O'Dwyer's opera 'Eithne' was given at the Gaiety Theatre. The libretto, which is in Irish, deals with ancient Irish history. Miss Evelyn Duffy, Miss Lilian Matthews, Mr. Joseph O'Mara, Mr. William Dever, Mr. Ernest Cameron and Mr. T. O'C. Reynolds were the principal vocalists. A large amateur chorus and an efficient orchestra, under the composer's direction, gave very successful performances of the work, which has just been published by subscription by Cramer & Co.

On May 5, Miss Nora Thompson's string quartet party gave their concluding recital for the season. The programme included Brahms's Quartet in A minor. Mr. Melfort D'Alton was the vocalist.

The Feis Ceoil is reported in the Competition Festival Record.

LIVERPOOL.

At the annual general meeting of the Liverpool Philharmonic Society, on May 9, it was resolved that the concerts should in future be directed by a variety of conductors, and that opportunity would be afforded of hearing more composers of the modern School. There can be little doubt that the innovation will commend itself generally—provided that the exclusion of the works of the great masters by those of the modern School is not carried to the other extreme. The concerts were established in 1840, and since 1849, when the Philharmonic Hall was opened, there have been six conductors in sixty-one years. Mr. C. Z. Hermann (1843-1865), Mr. Alfred Mellon (1865-1867), Mr. Jules (afterwards Sir Julius) Benedict (1867-1880), Mr. Max Bruch (1880-1883), Sir Charles Hallé (1883-1895), while the present conductor, Dr. F. H. Cowen, has held office since February, 1896.

The beautiful concert-room of the Philharmonic Hall, erected to the designs of Mr. John Cunningham, is generally conceded to have unexcelled acoustical qualities. Practically all the great vocalists and instrumentalists of the last half century have inscribed their names in the Society's three massive autograph-books. The first name is that of Thalberg, and the date is February 28, 1848.

In such a time of public calamity, it is not surprising to record an unusual lack of support given to the excellent Italian Opera Company directed by Cavalière F. Castellano, which recently gave some notable performances of 'I Trovatore,' 'Rigoletto,' 'Ernani,' 'Barbiere di Siviglia' and 'Ugonotti.' These and other well-known and well-worn favourites almost received new life when performed with such animation by singers whose temperament and training render them so especially fitted to invest the music with vocal interest and dramatic power. As a rule, performances of such merit do not languish unappreciated in this city, and in this instance there was a sufficiently weighty reason apart from the fickleness of public favour. All the same, this latter quality was broadly hinted at during the first week in the mysterious question which a string of sandwich-men bore on their boards in sad procession through the principal streets: 'Where are the music-loving people of Liverpool? Do they exist?' It is hoped that the question and appeal were satisfactorily answered.

At its ninety-second meeting, on March 9, the Johannesburg Musical Society, which was founded in 1902 as the Amateur Orchestral Society, contributed the overture 'Le Roi d'Yvetot' (Adam), Grieg's Pianoforte concerto in A minor (Mr. R. B. Lloyd playing the solo part), and Elgar's 'Sérénade Lyrique.'

MANCHESTER AND DISTRICT.

Silence has fallen upon our concert-halls, our orchestral players are scattered far and wide seeking sunnier climes by moorland and sea, and little remains to be added to the chronicle of the music season 1909-10.

The Beethoven Amateur Orchestral Society of Manchester, at its final concert under Mr. Cockerill, played Svendsen's 'Norwegian' Rhapsody, two movements from the 'Eroica' Symphony and the 'Valse triste' of Sibelius.

There is a tolerably widespread belief that if only Manchester and district amateur orchestras would enthusiastically take an interest in the orchestral classes at the Lancashire competitive festivals, the general level of playing would be considerably raised; for no body can compete for any reasonable period without its technique being improved. What has happened with choirs during the last decade would indubitably be reproduced in the case of orchestras; possibly not to the same degree at first, but there is nothing to stop the next decade witnessing a renaissance of amateur orchestral playing comparable to that which has been seen in choral singing of recent years. Somehow orchestras appear to think it infra dig. to compete. If they could but overcome such prejudice, and give the thing a fair trial, we should probably see some astonishing results.

Mr. Walter Evelyn conducts an amateur orchestral Society at Heaton Norris, and Mr. C. H. Fogg, the organist of the Hallé concerts and well-known up and down the North as an adjudicator and accompanist, has a quite good orchestral Society at Altrincham. Recently they have played two works composed by their conductor—one a Concert Overture in D minor, and an Adagio 'In sombre woods,' a newer work. The overture was played at the Blackpool North Pier Concerts under Mr. Simon Speelman last Easter, and also at Bournemouth. Mr. Speelman and his band think so well of the overture that it is to be included in the repertory of the Manchester Promenade Concerts next winter.

The Manchester Grammar School has given to the district many capable musicians, and it is interesting to find the old school keeping music well to the fore. Recently the school orchestra and choir, under Mr. A. R. Florian, gave Sterndale Bennett's 'May Queen' with complete success. Recently a Music Study Club has been commenced in the School.

The arrangements of the Gentlemen's Concerts for next season were indicated by Mr. E. J. Broadfield, who presided over the annual meeting of the Society on May 11. He stated that Mr. Henry J. Wood had again been appointed conductor of the orchestral music, and the programmes of the concerts which he would direct would again include not only the symphonies and other orchestral music of the older masters, but several works of interest not hitherto heard in Manchester. One of the most interesting performances would be that of Max Bruch's 'Frithjof,' on January 16, for orchestra, solo vocalists, and male choir.

NEWCASTLE AND DISTRICT.

On Wednesday, April 27, the Durham Musical Society gave, with full orchestra, an excellent performance of Elgar's cantata 'The Black Knight,' and Coleridge-Taylor's 'Hiawatha's Wedding-feast.' Mr. John Booth was the soloist, and proved a reliable and acceptable tenor. Mr. W. Ellis conducted for the last time: to the great regret of the members of the Society, and the general musical public, he has resigned his post. The same evening the Newcastle Catholic Choral Society sang Mendelssohn's 'Walpurgis Night.'

On May 2 a new choral Society of a hundred members, formed in connection with St. Silas's Church, Byker (in the east end of the city), made their debut in a creditable manner with Gade's 'Psyche,' under the baton of Mr. G. W. Holmes. Why a humorist should be let loose in the miscellaneous portion of a choral society's programme is somewhat of a mystery.

One of the great necessities of the district is a permanent local orchestra. So far we have only known two kinds of orchestra for serious concert work here, viz., the visiting organizations such as the Hallé or Scottish (naturally an enormously expensive item), and a 'scratch' combination of local players whose ordinary work at theatres, dances and skating-rinks does not tend to improve their power of playing the best music. Recently a scheme midway between these alternatives has been organized, and some of our best players banded themselves together, partly for enjoyment and partly with an eye to future development, and invited a small group of enthusiasts to hear a programme in the Tyne Theatre on the morning of May 12. Under the conductorship of the genial and veteran musical director of the theatre, Mr. E. J. Rogers, a very creditable performance of Beethoven's fifth Symphony, Sterndale Bennett's 'Naiades' overture, and Berlioz's 'Hungarian' March was given, and music-lovers were inspired with a hope that the good work thus started might develop eventually into a reliable permanent local orchestra.

NORWICH AND DISTRICT.

An excellent performance of Gounod's 'Redemption' was given by the Norwich Philharmonic Society (with the co-operation of the Norwich Choral Society) under the directorship of Dr. Bates, on March 31, in Norwich Cathedral. The Society's fourth and concluding concert of the season took place in St. Andrew's Hall, Norwich, on April 28, when Richard Buhlig was the great attraction, contributing to the concert Beethoven's Concerto No. 5, in E flat, and three solos by Liszt. Miss Betty Booker and Mr. Herbert Heyner were the vocalists. The former sang with great acceptance an Aria from 'Pagliacci' and two songs by Dr. Ernest Walker, and Harriet Ware, and Mr. Heyner gave some songs by Tchaikovsky. The concert concluded with Sir Charles Stanford's 'Ode to discord' for soli, chorus and orchestra.

The Saturday Popular Concerts under the direction of Dr. Bunnett, the Corporation organist, have now completed the season by a concert at which the Lord Mayor, Sheriff and Corporation of Norwich were present. The chief item was Miss Joan Trevalsa's song-cycle 'Peter Pan,' which was well received. In an interval between the pieces the Lord Mayor addressed the audience and referred to the fact that no less than sixty thousand persons had been present at these concerts during the last four years. He congratulated Dr. Bunnett on their success.

NORTH STAFFORDSHIRE.

The newly-formed 'Festival' Choir gave its first concert along with the North Staffordshire Symphony Orchestra in the Victoria Hall, Hanley, on April 28. Much comment had been made locally as to the wisdom of a new choir taking the title of 'Festival' before it had proved itself worthy of that title. It must be said in all fairness to the conductor (Mr. John Cope) that the first appearance of his choir created a stronger impression than even his best friends had anticipated. The sceptical must also remain satisfied, for the choir proved in performance to be an exceedingly good one. If the basses and contraltos could be strengthened, Mr. Cope will possess a really fine choir. As it remains the female choir is superb, and distinguished itself in Gade's 'Crusaders,' a work which, on the whole, created a great impression. Mr. Coleridge-Taylor's 'Meg Blane' was also performed, Miss Grainger-Kerr being the soloist. Miss Kerr with Mr. Webster Millar and Mr. Charles Tree made a most admirable trio in the 'Crusaders,' and the two latter artists gave, in excellent style, excerpts from Mozart, Wagner and Leoncavallo. In these the orchestra did good work, as well as in the two choral works, besides making a bold attack on Liszt's Rhapsody No. 2.

We regret to state that Dr. Richter has been compelled by indisposition to resign his position for this season as conductor of the Covent Garden Opera. It is satisfactory to hear that the rest he is enjoying is promoting recovery.

SHEFFIELD AND DISTRICT.

The closing weeks of the local musical season have been marked by a number of interesting concerts. The improvement in business conditions has had its reflex in the increased public support given to musical enterprise, and few of the societies in city and district can fail to be satisfied with the season's experiences.

In Mr. Granville Bantock's 'Omar Khayyám' (Part I.), the Sheffield Musical Union, at their Spring concert, grappled with music the versatility and brilliance of which exactly suited Dr. Coward's accomplished choir. The varying moods of the work were well realised by the choir, who gave a striking example of virtuoso choralism. Midway through the work Dr. Coward handed the baton to Mr. Bantock, who was enthusiastically greeted by the choir. The Hallé Orchestra played the score, on the whole, with precision and finish. The soloists, Miss Phyllis Lett, Mr. Webster Millar and Mr. Thorpe Bates, were excellent.

Mr. Maurice Tomlinson is doing yeoman work with the Heeley Musical Union, as was proved by a well-prepared and intelligent performance of Mackenzie's 'The Dream of Jubal.' Miss A. Skidmore was the reciter. Another suburban body which is working on progressive lines is the Norton Lees Choral Society. In tackling Sir F. Bridge's 'The Repentance of Nineveh' they appeared to be ambitious, but the selection was justified by the spirited and generally expressive singing under Mr. A. Bagshaw. Among other praiseworthy choral performances may be named 'Acis and Galatea' by the Tankersley Choral Society (Mr. T. Soar, conductor), the 'Hymn of Praise,' at Pye Bank Church, under Mr. G. A. Woodcock, and Mendelssohn's '13th Psalm,' at Abbeydale Primitive Methodist Church.

Two enjoyable and successful orchestral concerts have been given by amateur societies. At the first, by the Philharmonic Orchestra, Mr. J. H. Parkes conducted Prout's third Symphony and Mr. Bertram Shapleigh's 'Gur Amir' and 'The Mirage.' At the second, Mr. J. Duffell directed Beethoven's Symphony No. 4, and Miss Alice Walker played, with adequate technique and admirable control of expression, the solo portions of César Franck's Symphonic Variations and Liszt's 'Hungarian Fantasia.' Mention should also be made of some promising and interesting playing by a juvenile orchestra of Philharmonic probationers which Mr. J. H. Parkes zealously directs.

Mr. Thomas Brameld, himself a devoted admirer of Brahms's 'Requiem,' directed a reverent and well-balanced performance of that work by the Doncaster Musical Society. The Society has lofty aims; it achieves excellent results, and has done much to guide public taste in the Doncaster district. The 'Requiem' adds one more to the organization's list of successes. The soloists were Miss Betty Booker and Mr. Frederick Ranalow.

In Dr. Walford Davies's 'Everyman,' the choir of the Sheffield Amateur Musical Society were heard at the Spring concert in a work well fitted, in mood and technique, to their particular capabilities. It was not surprising therefore to find the Amateurs singing at the top of their 'form.' They also rendered a good account of Stanford's motet 'The Lord of Might,' and contributed the male-chorus parts of the same composer's 'Songs of the Sea.' The orchestra played Tchaikovsky's 'Casse Noisette' Suite and Wagner's 'Entrance of the gods into Walhalla.' The soloists were Miss Minda de Morgan, Miss Greta Rost, Mr. Frank Barker and Mr. Herbert Heyner. Mr. J. A. Rodgers conducted, and Mr. J. W. Phillips played organ solos.

The Chesterfield Orchestral Society makes further progress under Mr. J. F. Staton's instruction. A recent concert proved such to be the case, in the Nocturne from 'A Midsummer Night's Dream,' 'Valse Triste' (Sibelius), Beethoven's 'Coriolan' overture, and Mendelssohn's G minor Pianoforte concerto (soloist, Mr. Staton).

The Directors of the Queen's Hall Orchestra announce that, in addition to their usual Promenade and Symphony concerts next season, they intend giving a London Musical Festival at Queen's Hall in the spring of 1911.

Foreign Notes.

BARCELONA.

Under the musical direction of Herr Franz Beidler a complete performance of Wagner's 'Ring des Nibelungen' was recently given at the Liceo Theatre with great success.

BERLIN.

A new three-act opera entitled 'Poia,' composed by Arthur Nevin to the libretto of Randolph Hartley, has been lately produced at the Royal Opera House. The work was not a success, and the performance resulted in scenes of a kind which have fortunately not been experienced in any German opera house for many years.—During the summer holidays the stage of the Royal Opera House, owing to the danger in case of fire, is to be rebuilt at an estimated cost of £42,500.—On April 15 the Singakademie (conductor, Professor Georg Schumann) gave an excellent performance of Schumann's 'Paradies und Peri.' At the same concert a new composition by Max Bruch, for chorus, soprano solo and orchestra, an 'Ostercantate,' was produced with great success. The work, as might be expected, contains much beautiful music.—Excerpts from Wagner's 'Parsifal,' including the Prelude, Abendmahlfeier, Charsfreitagszauber and Titurels Totenfeier were performed under Herr Leo Blech's baton at a concert of the Königlicher Opernchor.

—Goldmark's symphony 'Ländliche Hochzeit' was played under the conductorship of Herr Edmund von Straus at the last concert of the Blüthner Orchestra's season.—Two new symphonic works, viz., Leopold van der Pals's Symphony in F sharp minor and the F minor Symphony by Hermann Zilcher were produced at an orchestral concert given by the young conductor, Herr Heinrich Schulz. Between these two compositions Herr Gustav Havemann gave an excellent performance of a new Violin concerto by the Swedish composer Tor Aulin. Madame Wanda Landowska gave an interesting recital of works by Bach, Mozart, Couperin, Scarlatti, Rameau and others, playing many of the compositions on a clavicembalo, on which instrument this artist obtains the most delicate and interesting effects.—Madame Wera Scriabine gave an interesting recital of pianoforte music by Scriabine. The programme, which contained many of the best examples of the composer's pianoforte works, included the Sonatas Opera 6 and 19.

BONN.

On May 3, 4 and 5 the Schumann-Brahms Festival was held with great success. The programme of the first concert, which was devoted to orchestral compositions by Brahms, contained the C minor Symphony, the Haydn Variations and the Violin concerto (soloist, Herr Zimbalist), and one of the Pianoforte concertos. Schumann's fourth Symphony in D minor and his choral work 'Paradies und Peri' were performed at the second concert. The programme of the third day was devoted to chamber music, vocal ensemble and solo numbers by both composers, and included Brahms's Trio with horn and Schumann's Phantasie for Pianoforte (Op. 17). Generalmusikdirektor Fritz Steinbach and Professor Grüters were the conductors of the festival, and among the soloists were Madame Julia Culp and Messrs. Backhaus and Dohnányi.

BREMEN.

At the Municipal Theatre the Berlin Komische Oper Company recently performed Debussy's musical drama 'Pelleas und Mélisande' for the first time in Bremen. The work aroused great interest.

BRESLAU.

An interesting curiosity by Leopold Mozart (the father of the great composer), a Symphony with the title 'Eine Bauern Hochzeit' (A rustic wedding) was performed at the Wednesday Popular Concerts.—The Singakademie and the Orchesterverein (conductor, Dr. Dohrn) ended the season with an excellent performance of Haydn's 'Creation.'

BRÜNN.

Vitezlav Novak's latest composition, 'Der Sturm,' for large orchestra (including pianoforte and organ), chorus and three vocal soli, was recently produced at a Philharmonic concert, under the conductorship of Herr Rudolf Reissig. The work, which is said to be one of the best examples of modern Bohemian music, had an enthusiastic reception.

BRUSSELS.

On April 18, the Théâtre Royal de la Monnaie produced the opera 'La Dorise,' composed by Cesare Galeotti to the libretto of Luigi Illica (French version by Paul Ferrier), with considerable success. At the same theatre the long expected revival of Gluck's 'Iphigénie en Aulide' took place, under the musical direction of M. Sylvain Dupuis, on April 26.—Excerpts from Wagner's 'Parsifal' were performed, under the baton of M. Edgar Tinel, at the fourth Conservatoire Concert on April 24. The part of Parsifal was sung by M. Ernest Van Dyck.—At the sixth Ysaye Concert, Mozart's delightful 'Symphonie concertante' (with Messrs. Ysaye and Van Hout as soloists) was performed.

COLOGNE.

Under the conductorship of Generalmusikdirector Fritz Steinbach an impressive rendering of Bach's 'St. Matthew' Passion was given at the twelfth and last Gürzenich concert.—At the last concert of the Musikalische Gesellschaft, a Pianoforte concerto in C minor by Karl Möskes, who played the solo part, was produced with considerable success.—At the Municipal Theatre the opera 'Akté,' by the well-known Spanish violinist Joan Manén, has recently been produced with great success under the musical direction of Herr Otto Lohse.

COPENHAGEN.

The third and last concert of the season of the Dansk Koncertforening took place on April 25. On this occasion a new symphony by the promising young composer Ludolf Nielsen was produced. The programme also included Christian Barnekow's songs for female chorus and orchestra, and the overture 'Fra Skoven ved Furesø' by Lövenskjöld.—On May 6, Puccini's opera 'Tosca' was performed for the first time at the Royal Theatre, with Miss Tenna Frederiksen and Messrs. Herold and Helge Nissen in the leading parts.

DORTMUND.

The eagerly anticipated Reger Festival took place with great success on May 7, 8, and 9. Six concerts devoted to this composer's works were given. The festival was inaugurated with an opening ceremony in the old hall of the Rathaus. After a sympathetic speech of welcome by the Burgomaster, Dr. Schmieding, to which Herr Reger responded, four of the composer's best songs, and the Pianoforte variations on a Theme by Bach (Op. 81), excellently played by Frau Kwast-Hodapp, were presented. At the concert given in the old Reinoldi Kirche, the gigantic Organ phantasia and double fugue on the name of Bach, and the Motet 'Mein Odem ist schwach,' proved very interesting. Two matinées of Reger's chamber music included his two String Quartets (Opera 74 and 109), and the Sonata for pianoforte and clarinet also figured in the scheme. At the two orchestral concerts the 'Symphonic Prologue to a Tragedy,' the Serenade for two orchestras, and the Violin concerto were heard. A new choral work, 'Die Nonnen,' made a deep impression. Among the artists were Madame Lula Mysz-Gmeiner, Messrs. Marteau, Hugo Becker and the Bohemian String Quartet. It may be added that the seats for each performance were almost sold out.

DÜSSELDORF.

An excellent performance of Liszt's 'Faust' Symphony was lately given, under the baton of Prof. Karl Panzner, at a concert of the Musikverein. At the last concert of the same Society, Edgar Tinel's interesting oratorio 'Franziskus' was performed. This original work was accorded a very favourable reception.

HELSINGFORS.

Massenet's opera 'Thais' has recently been performed for the first time, with the well-known Finnish singer, Madame Aino Ackté, in the title-part.

KÖNIGSBERG.

Gabriel Pierné's 'Kinderkreuzzug' (The children's Crusade) has been performed twice, with great success, under the musical direction of Herr Paul Scheinpflug.

LEIPSIK.

Auber's pretty opera comique 'Der schwarze Domino' was recently revived with much success at the Municipal Theatre. On the same occasion was performed for the first time in Leipzig the Intermezzo 'Susannens Geheimnis,' by Ermanno Wolf-Ferrari. The composer in this opera has succeeded in infusing new life into the old form of 'opera buffa.' The work had an excellent reception. On May 1 the annual opera festival at the same theatre commenced with a performance of Mozart's 'Die Zauberflöte,' with Fräulein Hempel in the part of the 'Königin der Nacht.' Herr Otto Lohse also conducted an excellent performance of Wagner's 'Die Meistersinger,' and the climax of the festival was reached with Beethoven's 'Fidelio' and Wagner's 'Tristan und Isolde,' both under the inspiring musical direction of Herr Generalmusikdirector Felix Mottl, from Munich.

LIÈGE.

On May 2 and 9, two festival Walloon concerts took place at the conservatoire. The programmes, which consisted only of works by composers from this part of Belgium, contained, among other things, Grétry's 'Suite des danses villageoises,' 'Macbeth' by S. Dupuis, and compositions by César Franck, Lekeu, Joseph Jongen and Vieuxtemps.

MAYENCE.

Bach's great Mass in B minor was well performed under the musical direction of Herr O. Naumann, at the seventh concert of the Mainzer Liedertafel.—The Philharmonischer Verein has given a concert performance of Weber's rarely heard one-act opera 'Abu Hassan.'

MONTREUX.

This resort has only recently taken its proper position in the musical world, and that it now does so is largely due to the educational efforts of the local musical society, which, though thoroughly cosmopolitan in character, was founded and for some years mainly supported by English residents and visitors. During recent years its work has been confined to the provision of high-class concerts, of which the success has been such that the management of the Kursaal—finding that there is a real demand for good music—now take considerable pains over their musical arrangements for the season. A small but good and well-balanced orchestra of between forty and fifty musicians is permanently engaged, and for two years the conductor has been M. de Lacerda, who is an earnest musician and a leader of considerable power and individuality and no small experience, for before he came to Montreux he was principal assistant to Vincent d'Indy at the Schola Cantorum, Paris, and conductor of the 'Concerts historiques' at Nantes. Besides the ordinary concerts given twice daily, usually under the direction of one of the assistant-conductors, symphony concerts are given weekly, and some afternoons are set apart for chamber music; throughout the past season the hall has been crowded at most of the performances. The following list of some of the composers whose symphonies or other important works have been heard this winter, will show how wide are M. de Lacerda's sympathies: Beethoven, Mozart, Haydn, Schubert, Mendelssohn, Weber, P. E. Bach, Handel, Wagner, Brahms, Liszt, Gluck, Rameau, Berlioz, Franck, Saint-Saëns, Dvořák, Tchaikovsky, Lalo, Bruch, Debussy, R. Strauss, Glinka, Borodine, Rimski-Korsakow, Smetana, Svendsen, Grieg, Elgar, Cowen, Bantock, and Cyril Scott. There have been special English, French, German, and Russian concerts devoted principally to modern works (such as were possible with an ordinary orchestra), also programmes devoted exclusively to Wagner and Saint-Saëns; and among solo performers have been Ysaye, Kubelik, Rislér, Pugno, Fröhlich, Forchhammer, Fryer, Schnabel, Stavenhagen, Stefi Geyer, and Randegger. This brief summary of the winter's work will give some idea of the musical activities of Montreux.

MILAN.

On April 21, the opera 'Margherita,' by Alfred Brüggenmann, a young German composer, was produced at the Scala Theatre. The work in question is the third of a trilogy dealing with Goethe's 'Faust.'

MUNICH.

The management of the Royal Opera, who had projected a revival of Pfitzner's 'Die Rose vom Liebesgarten' have decided not to perform that or any other work by this composer, as Herr Pfitzner has publicly protested against the management's treatment of his opera. He complained that the work would be handicapped by a second-rate cast and insufficient preparation. Public opinion on the matter seems to be that the composer's protest is not justified.

PARIS.

On April 22 the opera 'Salomé,' composed by M. A. Mariotte to the text of Oscar Wilde, was given for the first time at the Théâtre Lyrique (Gaîté). The composer of this work is, like the Russian composer Rimsky-Korsakoff, a retired naval officer. He wrote his opera some time before Richard Strauss had completed his, and it was first produced on October 30, 1908, under his own direction, at the Grand Théâtre in Lyons. On its present production the work was received very favourably.—'Le Mariage de Télémaque,' a comédie lyrique in five acts by Claude Terrasse (libretto by Messrs. Jules Lemaitre and Maurice Donnay), was produced at the Opéra-Comique on May 4 and had a good reception.—The Société Hændel recently gave a very good performance of Handel's 'Messiah.' Between the parts M. Guilman played Handel's Organ Concerto in F major (as Handel himself did when his work was given under his direction in London). At another concert of the same Society, Concertos for four violins and orchestra by Vivaldi and Leonardo Leo proved very interesting.—On April 17, at the last Colonne concert, Gustav Mahler's second Symphony, in C minor, was performed for the first time. The work, conducted by the composer himself, made a great impression, and the composer-conductor received a tremendous ovation.—Some new works by Abbé Lorenzo Perosi have been heard at the concerts given on April 14 and 21, under the auspices of the Société des Grandes Auditions Musicales. Of these the Suite symphonique 'Florence' and a Cantata 'Dies iste' proved very beautiful, and showed a great advance on the maestro's former efforts. On May 6, Richard Strauss's opera 'Salomé' was performed under the musical direction of M. André Messager for the first time at the Grand Opéra. This extraordinary work, which was first heard here a few years ago under the auspices of the Société des Grandes Auditions Musicales, again had a colossal success. The title-part was excellently played by Miss Mary Garden.

PRAGUE.

On April 19 the first performance (outside France) of the opera 'Quo vadis,' composed by Jean Nougoués to the text of Henri Cain, was given at the Weinberger Stadttheater. This effective work was well received.—On April 25 Richard Strauss's opera 'Elektra' was performed for the first time at the Tschech National Theatre, with sensational success. The management of the Deutsche Landestheater, who had previously refrained from producing this work, as the director, Herr Angelo Neumann (the pioneer of Wagner's 'Ring' in England), considered the performing fees excessive, gave it again on May 4, with the ensemble of the Royal Opera in Dresden.

SCHWERIN.

At the last Symphony Concert of the Court Orchestra, Hugo Wolf's posthumous choral work 'Morgenstimmung' was produced under the conductorship of Herr Kaehler, and proved very impressive.

TILSIT.

On Good Friday the Oratorien-Verein successfully produced M. D. Wolff's 'Stabat Mater' for soli, chorus and orchestra under the composer's direction.

WEIMAR.

A two-act opera written entirely by ladies, 'Das Gelöbniß,' composed by Miss Cornélie van Oosterzee (libretto adapted from the novel by Richard Voss, by Gertrud Klett and Louise von Wittich) was produced at the Grossherzogliche Hoftheater under the conductorship of Herr Peter Raabe on May 1. The music is said to be the product of a genuine artist, and aroused considerable interest.

WIESBADEN.

Under the auspices of the Verein der Künstler und Kunstfreunde, the Klingler Quartet recently played all Beethoven's string quartets.—Excellent performances of Bach's Magnificat and Brahms's 'German Requiem' were given at the third and last concert of the Cäcilienverein (conductor, Herr G. Kogel).—Weingartner's second Symphony, in E flat, figured in the programme of the twelfth Zyklusconcert.—At a special concert conducted by Herr Siegfried Wagner, works by his father and grandfather (Liszt) and some excerpts from his own operas 'Herzog Wildfang,' 'Sternengebot' and 'Banadietrich' were performed.

ZÜRICH.

Two operas comiques, Boieldieu's 'Johann von Paris' and Adam's 'König für einen Tag' have been revived lately with much success.

Country News.

BRIEFLY SUMMARIZED.

We cannot hold ourselves responsible for the opinions expressed in this summary, as the notices are either prepared from local newspapers or furnished by correspondents. Correspondents are particularly requested to enclose a programme when forwarding reports of concerts.

CHATHAM.—The Musical Society made a presentation to their able conductor, Mr. V. O. Cavendish Wardle, on May 17, of a handsome basket of cutlery. Mr. Wardle thanked the members in a few appropriate words.

CHELTENHAM.—The Memorial Concert given in the Town Hall, Cheltenham, on May 17, under the direction of Mr. C. J. Phillips, the director of the Cheltenham Philharmonic Society, was a solemn and impressive function, and was largely attended. Miss Mildred Jones sang appropriate solos, and Mr. Alfred Kastner's harp-playing was much appreciated. The feature of the concert was, however, the playing of the large orchestra in Chopin's Funeral march, Beethoven's 'Eroica,' Sullivan's 'In Memoriam' overture, and the Trauermarsch from 'Götterdämmerung.'

CHESTER.—A pianoforte recital was given at the Grosvenor Assembly Rooms by Miss Winifred Bellingham on April 27. Her selections included compositions by Bach, Couperin, Paradisi, Beethoven, Chopin, Beringer and Schubert-Tausig, which were all fairly well played. Miss Muriel Pedley (elocutionist) assisted.

CROYDON.—The Central Croydon Choral Society performed 'King Olaf' on April 23 in the Public Hall. The beauty of the work was well brought out by the choir and orchestra, assisted by Miss Esta D'Argo, Mr. Cynlais Gibbs and Mr. Dan Richards, the whole performance reflecting much credit on Mr. Roland A. Richards, the conductor.

EDMONTON.—The All Saints' Choral Society terminated their seventh season with a performance of 'Hiawatha,' Parts 1 and 2, in the Town Hall on April 21, under the direction of their new conductor, Mr. B. J. Hales. The solo vocalists were Miss Lilian Turnbull, Mr. Richard Ripley and Mr. Harry Long. The second part of the programme included Elgar's 'Pomp and circumstance' march in D by the orchestra, led by Miss Daisy Frost, and the vocal march 'Hail, bright abode' from Wagner's 'Tannhäuser.'

HUGHENDEN.—The Hughenden and District Choral Society gave their first concert on April 27 in the large room at Hughenden Manor, by kind permission of Mr. Coningsby Disraeli. The Society, inaugurated last November, numbers about sixty. The chief features of the programme were Hamish MacCunn's 'The wreck of the Hesperus' and 'The vagabonds' (Eaton Fanning). The choir was assisted by a full orchestra. Mr. F. J. Britnell, organist and choirmaster of Hughenden Church, conducted, and was warmly congratulated on the success of the concert.

LEAMINGTON.—The Choral Society gave a successful performance of Edward German's 'Merrie England,' in the Winter Hall, on April 26. The principal vocalists were Miss Dorothy Cook-Smith, Miss May Peters, Mr. Hubert Eisdell and Mr. Robin Overleigh—a very capable quartette. Mr. H. M. J. Gibbon conducted.

LOWESTOFT.—On St. George's Day, April 23, Elgar's 'Banner of St. George' was performed by the Choral and Orchestral Union, which made its first appearance on this occasion, under the conductorship of Mr. Charles Ganz. A creditable performance of the cantata was given, and was followed by a miscellaneous selection, in which Mrs. Margaret Preston, Miss Bessie Richards, Mr. G. King Smith and Mr. W. Grasham took part.

NORTHAMPTON.—A highly successful performance of Brahms's 'Song of Destiny' and Dvorák's 'Stabat Mater' was given by the Musical Society at the Corn Exchange on April 28. Mr. C. J. King conducted, and deserves every credit for the excellent training of the choir and orchestra, who responded to his beat with sympathy and enthusiasm. An excellent quartet of vocalists was provided in Miss Alice Baxter, Miss Lysette Mostyn, Mr. Alfred Heather and Mr. Francis Harford. Dr. Walford Davies's 'Solemn Melody' was included in the programme.

WELLINGTON.—Sternale Bennett's 'May Queen' was the principal feature of a concert given at the Town Hall, on Tuesday, May 3, by members of the Wellington Glee Party, whose singing reflected credit on the conductor, Mr. E. A. Jones. The solo vocalists were Madame Aston, Miss Miriam Beard, Miss Gertie Cotton, Mr. Hackett and Mr. T. L. Woolley. Trios by Beethoven and Hofmann were played by Miss N. Wrighton, Mr. J. Finney and Mr. T. Macindren.

The London Sunday School Choir will give three concerts at the Crystal Palace on Wednesday, June 15. The first (by 5,000 juveniles) will take place on the great Handel orchestra at 1 p.m., under the conductorship of Mr. J. Wellard Matthews, when a programme including Mendelssohn's 'O for the wings of a dove,' anthems, part-songs, action songs and Sunday School music, will be given. The second concert will take place at 6 p.m., with 4,000 adult performers, under the conductorship of Mr. William Whiteman, when selections from Handel's 'Samson,' Maunder's 'Olivet to Calvary,' Gaul's 'Holy City,' anthems by Barnby and West, and part-songs by Eaton Fanning, Sir R. P. Stewart and Hugh Pierson, and 'On the banks of Allan Water' (arranged by Elliot Button) will be sung with a full orchestra, under the conductorship of Mr. Wesley Hammett; the great organ, played by Mr. Horace G. Holmes, will accompany the pieces. The third concert will be given in the Concert Room at 4 p.m., when Jenkins's mandoline and guitar band (the largest in the world) assisted by eminent soloists will perform. In addition to the above the annual competition for the Founders' Grand Challenge Shield for choirs will take place in the Skating Rink at 3.30 p.m., and for the Barnard Shield at 11 a.m. Mr. Leonard C. Venables, Principal of the South London Institute of Music, will be the adjudicator.

The St. Martin's Choral Society gave a concert at Queen's Hall on April 29. The chief feature was the cantata 'The maid of Lorn' (Thomas Facer). Mr. W. Morrice conducted. The choir needs more tenors and basses.

An article on Robert Schumann (who was born in June, 1810) and his works will appear in our July issue.

Answers to Correspondents.

H. L. B.—The metronomic rates we suggest for the various sections of Hepworth's 'Fantasia on Mendelssohn's Volkslied' (organ), are as follows: Introduction, about ♩ = 66; Volkslied, about ♩ = 80. The pace of the variations should be taken faster or slower than the above, according to their character. Finale Fugato, about ♩ = 120. The Cadenza towards the end of the Fugato movement should, of course, be ad libitum in pace. Widor's compositions are issued by various French publishers. They can all be obtained from Novello & Co.

Mr. Edwin G. Croager, of 7, Colville Gardens, Bayswater, wants a copy of a hymn-tune commencing thus:

The Son of God goes forth to war, Who fol-lows in His train?

Can any of our readers supply one?

FALCON.—There is no royal way of getting a publisher to accept your songs. Everything depends upon their merit. Your only course is to send them round in turn to the well-known houses. If they are declined you can of course pay for the printing yourself.

W. J. P.—With reference to the word 'again,' in Dr. Harford Lloyd's choral setting of 'The Battle of the Baltic,' we think the singing pronunciation should be 'agayn,' not 'agen.' The latter pronunciation is, we know, given in the dictionaries.

SALOP asks: 'What in Tonic Sol-fa is the augmented second above Te and Fe?' The only answer we have to make is that there is no answer to such an absurd question. Surely it was not perpetrated in an examination paper?

Mr. George F. Smith, Seabourne, Bonham Road, Brixton Hill, S.W., would be glad to borrow or purchase a portrait of the late James Coward, who was organist of St. Magnus, London Bridge, and at the Crystal Palace.

THIRTY.—You should seek the advice of a local teacher. We cannot give pianoforte lessons through our correspondence columns. Get Pauer's 'Art of pianoforte playing,' No. 1 or Novello's Music Primers, price 2s.

M. H. (Gloucester).—The compositions you send do not display any talent.

THE HARVEST COVENANT

A SACRED CANTATA

FOR SOLO VOICES (S.C.T.B.) CHORUS AND ORCHESTRA

THE WORDS CHIEFLY SELECTED FROM THE REVISED VERSION OF THE SCRIPTURES.

THE MUSIC BY

A. L. COWLEY.

CONTENTS.

No. 1.—THE CREATOR'S GIFTS.

- (a) BASS SOLO AND CHORUS. "In the beginning, God created the heaven and the earth."
 (b) SOPRANO SOLO. "And God created man in his own image."
 (c) BASS SOLO AND CHORUS. "Behold, I have given you every herb yielding seed."
 (d) DUET (S. & T.) AND CHORUS. "Father Omnipotent, Creator good."

No. 2.—THE EVERLASTING COVENANT.

- (a) RECIT. (CONTRALTO). "By faith Noah, being warned of God."
 (b) CHORUS. "While the earth remaineth."
 (c) CONTRALTO SOLO AND CHORUS. "I have set my bow in the cloud."
 (d) DUET (C. & B.) AND CHORUS. "Father All-merciful, great God of love."

Each number is complete in itself and suitable for separate performances. For Harvest Festivals and other special occasions, the length of service can readily be arranged as required.

The choral music is effective, and its preparation will prove interesting to the members of Church Choirs.

Price: Vocal score, with Pianoforte or Organ Accompt., Two SHILLINGS; Tonic Sol-fa, Vocal score, ONE SHILLING.

JOHN MERBECKE

(A.D. 1550).

EDITED, WITH AN ACCOMPANIMENT FOR ORGAN

BY

BASIL HARWOOD.

This edition of Merbecke's Communion Service is based on Rimbault's reprint of 1871, after a careful comparison with a copy of the original edition of 1550 belonging to the Library of Christ Church, Oxford. The Plain Song is presented as nearly as possible in the form in which it first appeared, only such changes having been introduced as are required by the altered wording of our Prayer Book.

As its name implies, this book is designed for use with, and not in place of, other Church Hymnals.

For this reason the Hymns are numbered from 301, so that the numbers may not interfere with the use of any other hymn book, no other Church hymn book having as many as even seven hundred hymns. Each hymn has its own distinctive tune, and no hymn or tune in this work is found in Hymns Ancient and Modern (Old Edition), so that with the two books no duplication occurs.

ENDYMION'S DREAM

CANTATA

FOR SOPRANO AND TENOR SOLI, CHORUS AND ORCHESTRA

THE WORDS BY

C. R. B. BARRETT

THE MUSIC BY

S. COLERIDGE-TAYLOR.

Price One Shilling and Sixpence.

DAILY TELEGRAPH.

A short cantata, this, which occupies little more than half-an-hour in performance, it is likely to become popular on account of the pleasant nature of its music, even though a good deal more use might be, and perhaps should have been, made of the chorus. But not since, in his student days, Mr. Coleridge-Taylor evolved the opening part of his "Hiawatha" trilogy, has he composed music that seemed so grateful and so inevitable. . . . There are in the score many pages in which the composer's own individuality appears unmistakably, and his is a decidedly interesting individuality. This, combined with the picturesqueness of the music, the dramatic nature of the "book," and the comparative freedom of the score from ultra-modern difficulties, should enable the cantata to find many a hearing, more especially in choirs and places where the pitch is not so high as in use at Brighton.

MORNING POST.

His music shows no decrease in choral effect, and this remains the composer's strong point and the outstanding feature of the work. . . . Mr. Coleridge-Taylor is to be commended for his appreciation of the design best suited to the theme of the union of Sun and Moon. His eloquence of musical utterance, his command of orchestral colour, and his grasp of fundamental principles of choral writing are present throughout.

STANDARD.

Seldom has so much urgent music—music that breathes and reeks of romance and passion in almost every bar—been compressed into so small a compass. At a time when the future of English opera is upon every one's lips it is encouraging to meet with a work that reveals a sense of the theatre so unmistakably as does Mr. Coleridge-Taylor's so-called cantata. The composer employs the representative theme, but he employs it with discretion, and the orchestral writing throughout is both free and unfettered. Notwithstanding that the passion is nothing if not cumulative, the skill with which he avoids an anti-climax is remarkable. A delightfully atmospheric chorus of stars—constellations—founded on a descending chromatic figure, leads to Selene's solo, which contains some of the most beautiful music in the work; indeed, throughout the vocal writing is of an unusually grateful nature. Moreover, Mr. Coleridge-Taylor's stock of orchestral device and colour is unfailing.

PALL MALL GAZETTE.

Words which Mr. Coleridge-Taylor has wedded to appropriate and delightful music. . . . The work will undoubtedly add to Mr. Coleridge-Taylor's laurels.

MANCHESTER GUARDIAN.

The new cantata will not improbably rank high among the composer's works, for it seems to mark a distinct advance in his musical individuality. . . . The themes are in themselves striking and dramatically expressive. . . . He is more terse, more concentrated, and just as picturesque as ever, and he reveals almost unsuspected dramatic power.

OBSERVER.

It is the most vital work he has written for a long time. He has not since his early days so well resisted the temptation to set down superfluous things just because they come easily to him, and this is only another way of saying that it is conciser and better balanced than anything he has composed for a long time. It also shows a finer sense of climax and of dramatic music as distinct from that which is merely superficially picturesque.

ATHENÆUM.

Mr. S. Coleridge-Taylor's "Endymion's Dream," a cantata of modest proportions, but one of which the freshness and rhythmic life, and the dramatic and poetical character of the music, recall the composer's "Hiawatha."

WORLD.

Coleridge-Taylor's "Dream of Endymion" is likely to rank as his best work since "Hiawatha," for it is stronger and terser, and gives proof of greater intellectuality without loss of the qualities of sensuous charm which always distinguishes Mr. Coleridge-Taylor, even when he is least his best self.

Fellow of the Royal College of Organists.

PREFACE TO THE SEVENTH EDITION.

Through the kindness of Dr. E. H. Turpin the seventh edition of the Handbook of Examinations in Music includes the latest type of Papers set by Trinity College of Music, London, in their scheme of Local Examinations in Musical Knowledge.

The work will also be found to have been considerably enlarged by the addition of fifty specimen questions, with answers. They have been designed for the most part after the manner of those set in the Theory Paper for the L.R.A.M. Diploma, and also that required by candidates for the Higher Practical Examinations held by Trinity College of Music, London. The author earnestly hopes that these additions will considerably enhance the value of the Handbook, and render it increasingly helpful to students.

FRANKLIN TAYLOR.

EXTRACT FROM PREFACE.

In the course of my experience as a teacher of the pianoforte, an experience extending over many years, certain ideas have from time to time suggested themselves to me which have proved useful—to myself, as enabling me to express more clearly that which I desired my pupils to understand, and to my pupils, as tending to facilitate their comprehension of the various difficulties they have had to encounter, at the same time leading them to perceive the most practical means of overcoming them, and thus accelerating their general rate of progress.

These suggestions relate to both the mechanical and intellectual sides of the study of pianoforte-playing, or, briefly, to Technique and Expression, the chief matters implied by the first of these terms being the production of various qualities of tone, the choice of suitable fingering, and the best methods of attacking certain difficulties; while the second, which may perhaps be more aptly designated the means of expression, includes rhythm, phrasing, variety and gradation of tone, the use of the pedals, et cetera.

A Modern School for the Violin

BY

AUGUST WILHELMJ AND JAMES BROWN.

THE purpose of this Work is to provide, in one systematic and comprehensive scheme, all that is necessary for the acquirement of the Art of Modern Violin Playing.

"A Modern School for the Violin" consists of Six Books devoted to Daily Technical Practice, Six Books of Studies for Violin alone, and a large number of Pieces with Pianoforte Accompaniment, the Violin parts being specially edited for the purposes of teaching.

SECTION A.—TECHNICAL PRACTICE. IN SIX BOOKS.

The foundation of "A Modern School for the Violin" is laid by means of a series of Six Books dealing exclusively with the important subject of DAILY TECHNICAL PRACTICE. The First Book of Technical Practice (Book 1A) is limited to the 1st Position; the Second Book (2A) to the 1st, 2nd, and 3rd Positions; the Third Book (3A) to the first five Positions; and so on. Bowings and other technical devices are introduced in a similarly progressive manner throughout. Each Book of Technical Practice is divided into "Lessons" (or Chapters), and each Lesson contains a number of short repeating Exercises on some definite point of Violin Technique—as Fingering, Bowing, &c.,—with the needful explanations. Included in each Book will be found a complete set of Scales and Arpeggi, arranged according to the particular stage of advancement reached.

Taken as a whole, this section is intended to facilitate, and to insist on, a thorough, steady, and continuous progress in the mastery of the Instrument, this being the only possible means of preparing the groundwork for artistic achievement with all its lasting delights.

SECTION B.—STUDIES. IN SIX BOOKS.

Section B is formed of a series of original and selected Studies, in Six Books. Each Book of Studies (Section B) is carefully co-ordinated, in respect of difficulty and range of subject, with the correspondingly numbered Book of Technical Practice (Section A). Thus the First Book of Studies (1B) is written in the 1st Position; the Second Book (2B) in the 1st, 2nd, and 3rd Positions; the 3rd Book (3B) in all Positions up to and including the 5th; and so on. It should further be explained that the two Sections are designed to complement one another, and that the "School" must be practised, not in single Books of Technical Practice and Studies alternately, but in pairs. Thus, Books 1A and 1B are to be taken concurrently, then Books 2A and 2B, 3A and 3B, and so on, and the appropriate pairs are now issued bound together in cloth (see Cloth Bindings below).

These Pianoforte Studies have been highly praised by M. VLADIMIR DE PACHMANN, who has expressed his intention of playing some of them during his Recital Tour in the United States. His testimonial is published with the Work, which consists of Twelve Numbers, specially designed to develop power and skill in the fourth and fifth fingers. The importance of trying to equalize these weaker fingers with the stronger ones is unquestionable, as defective execution is more often traceable to this inequality of the fingers than to any other cause.

EXTRACTS FROM PREFACE.

My guiding principle has been to place before the reader the facts collected by me as well as the conclusions at which I arrived. This will enable him to see the subject in all its bearings, with all its pros and cons, and to draw his own conclusions, should mine not obtain his approval.

My researches had for their object the whole life of Chopin and his historical, political, artistic, social, and personal surroundings, but they were chiefly directed to the least known and most interesting period of his career—his life in France, and his visits to Germany and Great Britain.

The Competition Festival Record

No. 23.

THE death of King Edward on May 6 was a great shock to the nation, and naturally had a paralysing effect on competitive festivals held immediately after the deeply deplored event. At Morecambe, on May 7, it was resolved to abandon the festival on that day, and to endeavour to arrange to hold it on June 18. We hope our Northern readers will take note of this date and help to mitigate a disaster to one of the greatest pioneer festivals held in this country. At Buxton, after an anxious early morning discussion, it was decided to abandon the concert announced for the evening and to carry on the competitions. Among the festivals entirely given up were Bedale, Yorkshire (May 18, 19), and Southport (June 1, 2, 3, 4). Truro altered its dates from May 11, 12, to May 25, 26. Aberdeen (June 2 to 5) and Lytham (June 8 to 11) will hold their festivals as announced.

THE CHOICE OF MUSIC FOR COMPETITIONS.

THOUGH ill-health has, to every one's regret, compelled Canon Gorton to give up his residence at Morecambe, his interest in the festival he founded there twenty years ago is unabated. He is still president of the institution, and in that capacity penned a preface to the syllabus of the recent festival, an imposing volume of 46 pages, whose very bulk suggests the importance to which the event has arrived, while its contents indicate the educational value of the competitions. It is pleasant to find that the Canon's manifestos have lost none of their stimulating force, but make it plain that his mental energy has in no degree abated. He loves to break a lance with a worthy antagonist, and this time he has found one in a speaker at last year's meeting of the Association of Competitive Festivals, who declared that 'what was wanted was that every singer at every choral competition should be made to feel that all his work only reaches its climax in the combined performance of one masterpiece.' Against this position Canon Gorton utters a forcible protest: 'I entirely dissent from this statement. It is the natural opinion of one accustomed to associate the word Festival with a big chorus, backed by an imported orchestra, with certain soloists to brighten the firmament. I have yet to learn that the value of any art work depends on its size. We do not most of us buy our pictures by the square yard; personally I should prefer to be asked to hang in my house one of Raphael's silver-point drawings to one of his cartoons. But our critic adds: "That it is not enough to teach people in our country districts part-songs and glees, you must bring them into touch with the great music of the earth." Here again size is taken as the test of merit. I would on the contrary suggest that when a choir is striving week after week to get at the heart of a part-song by Brahms, or Cornelius, or Elgar, it is as near the great music of the earth as when digesting disjecta membra of some well-known oratorio. At least I would say that the climax of our festival must not be sought in the rendering of music by combined open choirs, highly as we value such work, for this music can obviously be better rendered in large centres of population by more thoroughly trained choruses; but the climax must be sought in the perfection of rendering some part-song or madrigal which is worthy to have its place "with the great music of the earth."

Perhaps it may be permitted for an outsider to comment on this very interesting controversy, even though he may be in danger of catching a few blows from each of the combatants. To the impartial looker-on it seems rather like the case of the knights who were quarrelling as to the colour of a shield, which was affirmed to be black by the one and white by the other, but which the onlooker discovered to be parti-coloured. If we consider Canon Gorton's objections, his analogies from a sister art do not very materially help him. One can quite understand that his embarrassment when asked to hang a Raphael cartoon in his house would even exceed that of another distinguished ecclesiastic, the Vicar of Wakefield, when confronted by that famous family group which could not be moved out of the room in which it was painted. And there is the additional reflection that, while the silver-point could be, presumably, by Raphael's own hand, the cartoons are universally admitted to be only students' work. This is, however, rather beside the mark, and to come nearer to the point, there is surely something more than mere bulk which makes us reckon the B minor Mass 'greater' than any one of Bach's church cantatas, the 'Missa Solennis' 'greater' than even one of Beethoven's 'Posthumous' quartets, perfect as these are of their kind, the German Requiem 'greater' than even the finest of Brahms's part-songs, or the 'Dream of Gerontius' 'greater' than Elgar's inspired chorus, 'Go, song of mine,' which was included in this very syllabus. The quality of the work may be equal, as in the instances just quoted, but it is because of the higher and more sustained effort involved in the scale, the complexity, the colour, and the amplitude of design of a symphony that, ceteris paribus, it must be allowed to be of greater artistic importance than, say, a sonata. For this reason one cannot but sympathise with the attitude of the speaker who desired that such things—without, be it noted, excluding music of smaller calibre—should be brought to the notice of competitors.

The practical difficulties in the way of a complete performance of such music are obvious enough, but perfection of execution, however desirable, is after all of less importance than spreading a familiarity with the greatest efforts of the masters. No doubt it would have to be done through the medium of what the Canon calls 'disjecta membra,' but it is by the disjecta membra of the Elgin marbles that our best artists are influenced, and in this case the mere fact of having practised a few of the choruses in some of the works already mentioned would at least serve as an introduction to them, and would whet the appetite for a still closer acquaintance.

Far be it from me to suggest that these 'extracts of oratorio' should oust the madrigal and part-song.

There is room for both,—it is worthy of note that for the principal choral class at Morecambe four separate tests had to be prepared. Each would have its own function. The part-song serves its purpose in developing a finer and more brilliant virtuosity in choral singing than we have known hitherto, and in this respect it has done, and is doing, a very great service to music in this country. But its weakness is that from an educational point of view—which is surely the main aspect of the matter—it has this disadvantage: It compels candidates to devote a vast amount of time and labour in polishing up to the *n*th degree a composition which may be, and generally is, of fine quality, but is undoubtedly of small calibre. Surely a wider appreciation and a sounder musicianship would be stimulated and forwarded were one of the tests prescribed a study of all the choruses, or a considerable proportion of them, in some great masterwork, one of which would at the time of the competition be selected by the judges for performance. The choir which had prepared itself for such a task could not, of course, be expected to achieve the same highly-finished technique as one which had been concentrating its efforts upon half-a-dozen pages of a part-song, but it can hardly be doubted that its artistic horizon would be much wider. Perfection of performance is a great thing, but a broad and deep musicianship is even greater, and I should like to see both flourish side by side at these admirable festivals, as to whose influence for good in the broadest sense I have no manner of doubt.

HERBERT THOMPSON.

Mr. Ivor Atkins, whose views are discussed by Canon Gorton and Mr. Herbert Thompson, writes to us as follows:

I see from the preface to the Morecambe festival syllabus that Canon Gorton combats the position which I took up when speaking about 'combined music' before the Association of Competition Festivals last year. I see no reason to go back upon one word of what I then said; but I should like to make it quite clear, as I hope I did at the time of speaking, that I quite realize that there must be festivals where for various reasons combined music is impossible. Where this is so, I have not a word to say against the cultivation of part-songs, &c.; indeed, no one is more ready than I am to recognize the great debt which our choral technique of to-day owes to such festivals as Morecambe through the perfection to which they have brought part-singing. But in speaking about combined music on this occasion, I had more in my mind the competition festivals which draw upon country districts. Here the case is different, for whereas the large centres of population are well cared for, in that there are ample opportunities of hearing music of all kinds, the country districts depend almost entirely upon the competition festivals for their chance of hearing and taking part in great works. Without the orchestra and soloists which these festivals afford them, the villages have no hope of entering into such choral works. In their case I cannot but think that the spread of musical knowledge is of far greater importance than choral technique per se, important as this is.

In my view, more valuable work is done by opening people's ears to the great masterpieces than in teaching them to sing small things more or less perfectly, though there is every reason why the part-song should be cultivated side by side with a great choral work, on account of its greater serviceability for competitive purposes.

It is perhaps unnecessary to labour the point as to what we all mean by great works—and it certainly is not necessary in estimating the value of a painting to consider whether it can or cannot be contained in one's house—for I think we are all agreed as to the relative position of the great masterpieces of a composer when compared with his smaller works, however perfect these may be. Those who only know Elgar by such exquisite things as the 'Evening Scene' or 'Go, song of mine,' are no more conversant with his real greatness without some familiarity with a work like 'Gerontius' or the Symphony in A flat, than they would be with that of Mozart were they to judge him only from his lovely 'Ave Verum' without any knowledge of such a work as the immortal 'Requiem.' Where the opportunity for combined music is given there can never be the least doubt left in the mind of the hearer, from the nature of the singing, that the singers are passing through what is often the experience of their musical lives. And who that has heard the extraordinary freshness and enthusiasm of such singing (as, for example, that heard at Kendal this year) can doubt that the singers themselves realize what it is to be in touch with 'the great music of the earth'?

A SUMMARY OF AN ADJUDICATOR'S TOUR.

The competition festivals held recently have been so numerous, it is not possible for the COMPETITION RECORD to give very full accounts of the proceedings. A brief survey is attempted here of the tour of one adjudicator. A first general impression of this tour and a study of the reports of other festivals is that the movement is decidedly flourishing. The set back, owing to the lamented death of King Edward, is only temporary in its effect.

SCUNTHORPE.

April 19, 20.

This is a festival designed to appeal to North Lincolnshire, and transplanted from Brigg to Scunthorpe for the first time. The scheme is a project of Mr. Gervase Elwes, the distinguished singer, and his wife, Lady Winefride Cary-Elwes, who have family connections in the district. Scunthorpe is an inland manufacturing town and contains a large working-class population. It showed itself to be remarkably keen both in sending entries and in furnishing audiences: that at the concert was overwhelming, many hundreds being turned away from the large Market Hall, in which all the proceedings took place. The following villages and townships contributed entries:

JUNIOR.

Athorpe (Mr. Norris).
Brigg (Mrs. Wheeler).
Crosby (Mr. Taylor).
Crowle (Mr. Bryan).
Frodingham Girls' (Miss Moorman).
Frodingham Boys' (Mr. Beardsley).
Kirtton (Mr. Urquhart).
Scunthorpe Girls' (Miss Nanson).

ADULT.

Ashby (Mr. Scadding).
Brigg (Mr. Rowbottom).
Crosby (Mr. Taylor).
Crowle (Mr. Bryan).
Elsham (Mr. Ward).
Frodingham (Mr. Beardsley).
Hibaldstow.
Killingholme and Ulceby (Mr. T. A. Ward).
Saxby (Mr. Ward).
Scunthorpe Choral Society (Mr. Nicholson).
Scunthorpe Ladies' (Mr. H. E. Dudley).
Scunthorpe P.M. (Mr. J. Brown).
Scunthorpe Wesleyan (Mr. J. H. Markham).
Scunthorpe Parish Church (Mr. T. Dudley).
Thornton Curtis.
Waddingham (Mr. Walley).
Wrawby.

There were numerous sections: all school classes had to be tested in sight-singing. In the junior classes Kirtton Lindsay, Crowle, Scunthorpe Girls' and Crosby were winners of first prizes. A good deal of the singing was first-rate and exhibited skilful training on the part of school teachers. In the adult sections the competition was very keen. Killingholme and Ulceby did remarkably well, and Frodingham, Thornton Curtis, and Scunthorpe also gained first prizes.

A concert was given on April 20, at which some of the winning choirs sang and the combined choirs took part. The soloists were: Mrs. Montgomery, Miss Katherine Jones, Mr. Gervase Elwes, Mr. Pedro de Zulueta, Lady Speyer (violin) and Miss Ada Thomas (pianoforte). The excellent accompanist was Mr. Berkeley Mason, of Hull, who was also the official accompanist at the competitions.

LEICESTER.—April 22, 33.

This now important event grew out of a competition started a few years ago by the local Y.M.C.A. It is now managed by a strong, independent committee, and by its good management has drawn competitors from a wide circle. A busy medical man, Dr. Lewis Lilley, who is also a cultivated amateur musician, contrives to find time to undertake the heavy duties of the honorary secretaryship. The judges were Mr. Stephen Champ (for strings), Dr. Henry Fisher (pianoforte and organ), and Mr. Granville Humphreys and myself for solo singing and choral work. I can only speak of the classes I heard. On the first day, the large hall in which the competitions were held and the surrounding corridors, swarmed with orderly children. Here, at least, it was evident that school teachers had grasped the great educational value of these competitive gatherings. Leicester has always had a good reputation for its school singing, and on this occasion there was much to admire in the results. Five Sunday School choirs sang in one section, and St. John's, Clarendon Park, gained the first place by a beautiful performance of Smart's two-part song, 'The Lord is my Shepherd.' In another class for girls' choirs, Avenue Road was the most successful of six entries, and in a class for boys some beautiful singing by the Egerton School Choir from Melton Mowbray was deservedly successful. When it came to boys and girls mixed, Lansdowne Road C.S. displayed the best results. Solo singing is a popular feature of this festival. No fewer than 37 sopranos, to contraltos, 29 tenors, 30 baritones, 13 basses, and 37 juniors competed. There were many good voices, and often there was singing of a high grade. The educational value of these classes must be very great. Criticisms were eagerly listened to. Entries in other solo classes were as follows: Pianoforte 71, organ 3, violin 11. Sixteen choirs entered in the chief male-voice class; Rugby won the first prize. Saxe-Coburg Street Wesleyan were successful in a class for mixed-voice Church and Chapel choirs that produced some touching performances of Gounod's 'Come unto Him.' Elgar's 'My love dwelt in a northern land' was the test for mixed-voice choirs; out of eight entries, Leicester Co-operative secured the first place. In this section the ability and training displayed were of a very high grade.

Altogether the competition was a satisfactory one from every musical point of view.

DONCASTER.—April 27, 28.

This new centre grew out of the holding of an inter-county festival, in which the old-established centres at Brigg, Retford, Pontefract and York took part. Some of the townfolk were inspired to endeavour to stir up their own resources, and formed a strong committee for this purpose. They were fortunate in securing as their president Mrs. Herbert Peake, whose experience in organizing the Retford festival was thus made available. The entries were fairly numerous for a first trial. The school classes were especially satisfactory. Many school teachers and conductors, who might have been expected to support the scheme, seemed to prefer to wait to see what it was like. Now that the stimulative and educational side of the festival has been made plain, and the fact that it provides a unique musical entertainment has been experienced, it may be hoped that Doncaster may develop into one of the most important centres in the Kingdom. There is a fine hall. The following junior choirs entered:

Askern Provided Schools (Mr. L. E. Goodhead).
Austerfield (Miss E. Buckle).
Bawtry, mixed (Mr. J. W. Taylor).
Brampton Bierlow (Mr. H. A. Swiss).
Christ Church Girls' (Miss A. J. Wheeler).
Don. Wesleyan Boys' (Mr. McKenzie).
Don. Wesleyan Girls' (Miss S. Frost).
Don. Hyde Park Boys' (Mr. G. I. Hyde).
Felkirk (Mr. Ernest Hoyland).
Royston Girls' (Miss M. Walmsley).
Stirling Street C.S. (Don.) (Mr. W. Redmayne).
Wath-on-Deane National (Mr. Arthur Gate).
Wheatley Park Boys' (Don.) (Mr. W. Y. Brennan).
Woodlands (Don.) (Mr. J. Mason).
Wheatley Junior (Don.) (Miss S. J. Cock).
Wheatley Park Girls' (Don.) (Miss Freeman).
Wheatley Park Junior Boys' (Mr. W. Y. Brennan).

There were eleven sections for juniors. Doncaster Wesleyan Boys', Hyde Park C.S. Boys', Royston Girls', and Bawtry were among the prize-winners.

A feature of the junior day was a Morris-dance competition, which was judged by Mr. T. Hercy Denman. A passion for duet singing seemed to be prevalent, for no fewer than thirty-three parties entered. The test-piece was Coven's 'Violets.'

Solo-singing, violin solos, instrumental trios, vocal quartets, and choral societies occupied the second day. Ranskill and Bawtry were the only entries in the chief choral section. Ranskill was placed first by a mark or two.

TUNBRIDGE WELLS.—April 29, 30.

This is a new festival, the inception of which is owing to Mrs. Wace, of Frant. It was successful in attracting the interest of the surrounding district, but the entries from Tunbridge Wells itself were not numerous. The voices generally were rather thin; but in cases where a skilful voice-developer had been at work, the tone had depth and resonance. This proved that the thin quality noticed in other choirs was the result of habit rather than a physical necessity.

Eight schools entered in five sections. St. Barnabas's Boys', Hurst Green, Frant, and East Grinstead were prize-winners. An enjoyable concert was given to and by the juniors.

Eight adult choirs competed in ten sections. The first places in the chief classes were won by Mrs. Bisshopp's Choir (Mr. W. W. Starmer), Frant (Mr. F. Jameson), Wadhurst (Rev. Leslie Stevenson), Hurst Green (Mr. Watkins), and Crowborough (Herr Grimm).

At an evening concert the choirs combined to sing Mendelssohn's '42nd Psalm.' Miss Hilda Foster sang the solo and also contributed some charming performances of songs. Miss Helen Egerton played the violin, and the specially-organized orchestra played the Ballet music from 'Rosamunde' (Schubert).

LEITH HILL.—May 4.

This is one of the most admirably-managed festivals I have ever visited. The spirit of order reigns supreme, and all the complicated work of a crowded day works smoothly. The platform government both for competitions and concerts is unique. Every member of a choir knows exactly where to sit, and at the competition the choirs almost glide in turn to their places in front. A strong feature is made of the combined music, which is well rehearsed and performed with the aid of an excellent orchestra mostly professional, and it is all conducted by an experienced musician, Dr. R. Vaughan Williams. This year the principal work was a long selection from Handel's 'Samson.' It was thoroughly well suited to the resources, and gave untold pleasure to all concerned, including the audience. In order to accommodate distant village choirs and their friends, and also to meet the convenience of the Dorking townfolk, the whole programme was performed in the afternoon and again in the evening. The soloists were Miss Maude Phillips (herself a product of Northern competitions), Miss Helen Anderton, Mr. Charles Child, and Mr. Francis Harford.

The competitions began at 9 a.m. and continued until the luncheon hour. Eight villages sent choirs to compete in six sections. One of the test-pieces was the trio 'Sound sleep' (R. Vaughan Williams), and this beautiful work was performed at the concert by the combined choirs with a new orchestral accompaniment by the composer. The results of the competitions are given below:—

SUMMARY OF MARKS OBTAINED.

In a later issue of the Record I hope to give detailed particulars of the platform arrangements devised by the Rev. G. K. Olivier.

It should be added that the competitors enjoyed the great advantage of having Mr. Henry Bird as their accompanist.

BUXTON.—May 5, 6, 7.

It was fortunate that during a cold and wet spell of weather, this festival was held in the comfortably heated and commodious Winter Gardens. The entries in the forty classes announced in the syllabus kept both Mr. Harry Evans and myself, working separately, busy for the three days. Solo-singing classes are very popular at this festival, and they draw competitors from a considerable area. The pianoforte classes are also well supported. Mr. Evans declared that he had never before heard so many good players at one festival. Most of the soloists were heard on the first day. The chief contest was, however, that for a choral challenge shield. Although there were only two choirs, much local interest was excited. Each choir had to sing Smart's 'Shepherd's lament' and a selection from Coleridge-Taylor's cantata, 'Meg Blane,' which was afterwards performed by the combined choirs. The Bradwell Society (Mr. Norman) were the happy winners.

On the second day the school children came, and there were some remarkable performances. The Macclesfield Industrial School boys, conducted by Mr. H. S. Rees, exhibited very fine training, and an action-song, 'A Dutch fair,' performed by a class from the Girls' Council School, Buxton, was one of the most amusing and clever things of its kind I have ever seen. A performance of the school cantata 'The Frogs and the Ox' (Bridge), was an excellent one. In view of the alarming news as to the condition of King Edward, the whole gathering stood up and sang the National Anthem with moving fervency.

When the saddening news of the late King's death reached Buxton, there was some perplexity as to what should be done, and after full consideration it was resolved to carry out the competitions and abandon the usual final concert. Practically all the choirs came, and in the open class there was some superb singing from the best-equipped choirs. The Sale and District Musical Society (Mr. A. Higson) gained the chief honours in the female-voice choir and mixed-voice choir sections.

The whole festival was a very pleasant one to be associated with. This was largely owing to the courtesy of Mr. A. P. Shaw, the chairman of the executive, Dr. Quinton-Bown and Mr. F. Gummer, the secretary.

CENTRAL AND EAST ESSEX (CHELMSFORD).

May 7, 9.

This is a festival that shifts its venue in the large district to which it appeals. The first day was put aside for adult choirs and a concert. Notwithstanding the cloud that had fallen on the nation and oppressed every individual, it was thought best to proceed with both events, especially as the concert-programme was not inappropriate. Fourteen choirs competed in several classes. Honours fell to Feering (Miss Hunt), Birch (Rev. E. P. Luard), Springfield (Mr. F. W. Harnack), and Hatfield Peverel (Mr. and Mrs. F. C. Bramwell).

The concert programme included a selection from Parts I. and II. of the 'Christmas oratorio' (Bach), 'Blessed are they that mourn,' from Brahms's 'Requiem,' and 'The Last Post' (Stanford). Miss Muriel Foster, Miss Hilda Foster (Mrs. Bramwell), and Mr. Gregory Hast sang. Dr. Hugh P. Allen conducted and adjudicated, and Mr. Cyril Rootham assisted in the adjudicating.

On May 9, I judged the junior classes. Thirteen places sent choirs. Sight-singing was made obligatory, and was generally fair. The vocal tone was not often full, but there was often considerable refinement and many evidences of painstaking and skill. The following schools and classes gained first places:

Hatfield Peverel (Mr. A. Bennett).
Gt. Leighs C.S. (Mr. A. G. Suckling).
Birch Band of Hope (Miss Margaret Luard).
Friars Boys' C.S. (Mr. S. M. Crow).

A short concert concluded the proceedings. There were very fair audiences.

W. G. McNAUGHT.

EAST LONDON (PEOPLE'S PALACE).

April 25 to 30.

It is gratifying to record the continued success of this festival. Clearly its exploration of the latent musical possibilities of the East End is by no means approaching conclusion. In order to concentrate attention on the principal need of the district, the authorities devote their programme, with the exception of a few classes for trios and quartets, vocal and instrumental, entirely to choral competitions. Their syllabus is a comprehensive scheme that invites the presence of choral societies, commercial house choirs, evening continuation classes, choirs from places of worship, and schools.

In the juvenile contests the provision of a compulsory sight-singing test proved no deterrent or difficulty for the choirs. Prizes were won by the following:

Old Montague Street Girls' (Miss M. L. Ping).
Coborn School for Girls (Mrs. Birch).
George Green's School, Poplar (Mr. E. B. Elliott).
St. John's Road, Hoxton, Higher Grade (Mr. F. Luke).
Teesdale Street, Bethnal Green (Miss M. A. Wallington).
St. John's School, N.E. Bethnal Green (Mr. R. C. Vince).
St. Paul's, Shadwell, Band of Hope.
Sir John Cass Foundation School (Mr. F. Poulton).

The total number of entries in these eight classes was forty-one.

In the competitions for evening school choirs, the prizes fell to Queen's Road E.C.S., Dalston (Mr. W. Penn), in both the mixed-voice and female-voice divisions; in the contest for commercial choirs, Clarnico Choral Society, Hackney (Mr. T. H. Warner), were unchallenged; in the section for choirs from places of worship, first positions were secured by St. Michael's, City (Mr. F. S. Winter), St. Mary, Stratford-le-Bow (Rev. H. J. Kitchin), and Cubitt Town P.M. (Mr. J. R. Jones). The successful female-voice choirs were Shoreditch C.E. Women's Help Society (Mr. W. A. Warren), St. James's, Ratcliffe, Young Women's Guild (Mrs. Atherton Knowles), and Queen's Road, Dalston, E.C.S. (Mr. W. Penn); these were winners in the elementary, intermediate and advanced sections respectively; the total entries numbered twenty-three. Prizes were won by St. Thomas's, Stepney (Rev. C. J. Beresford) and Mr. Day-Winter's male-voice choirs. St. Thomas's were also successful in a class for mixed-voice societies of thirty-one to sixty voices. The tests in the chief choral class were Wood's 'How sweet the tuneful bells' and Morley's 'Fire, fire, my heart'; Mr. Day-Winter's Select Choir were victorious over Clarnico (Mr. T. H. Warner). Prize-winning choirs took part in the final concert, and combined choirs sang Mendelssohn's 'All men, all things' and 'O great is the depth,' Wagner's 'Hail, bright abode,' and Handel's 'Round about the starry throne,' under the direction of Sir Walter Parratt. Lady Maud Warrender sang, and Mr. Montague Phillips was the organist. The prizes were distributed by H.H. Princess Marie Louise of Schleswig-Holstein.

The adjudicators were Dr. Henry Coward, Dr. Walford Davies, Dr. Arthur Somervell, Dr. Percy Buck, Mr. James Bates, and Mr. W. McNaught, Jun.

YORK.

April 26, 27, 28.

At this festival a large amount of attention is devoted to village choirs, and these bodies responded with a corresponding amount of enthusiasm. For the first time the competition extended over three days.

In the village sections first prizes were won by the following choirs:—

Terrington Male-voice and Female-voice choirs.
Monk Fryston Male-voice and Female-voice choirs.
Slingsby (Hymn and chant competition).
Darrington (Sight-reading).
Hovingham, Slingsby, Terrington, and Wykeham grouped choir.
Healaugh.
Harewood.

A challenge cup for village choirs was taken by Harewood; the tests were: 'So soft and warm' (Cornelius) and 'You stole my love' (Macfarren).

A day was set apart for 'novice' choirs. Church Fenton and Wilberfoss secured all the first prizes in the five competitions.

The competitions open to school choirs resulted in successes for Healaugh, Skelton, St. Paul's, Haxby Road C.S. and Poppleton Road C.S. The Honesty Girls' Club and the Sylvia Quartette also secured prizes.

In the open classes Mr. Rymer's Choir gained first place in the test for anthem singing, the test for sight-reading, the male-voice competition (test, Elgar's 'Reveille') and the challenge shield competition for mixed-voice choirs (tests: Brahms's 'O lovely May' and Elgar's 'O wild west wind'). Northampton won the open competition for ladies' choirs.

The adjudicator was Dr. Walford Davies.

WESTMORELAND FESTIVAL.

April 27 to 30.

This model festival is now held every two years, and the present event was the twenty-third of the series. The combined performance of great works, with the assistance of the Queen's Hall Orchestra under Mr. Henry J. Wood, and an eminent soloist, is the outstanding feature of the scheme, and to some extent dwarfs the importance of the competitions. But the promoters, at the head of whom is Miss Wakefield (whose absence through illness was deeply deplored by her devoted following), are still convinced of the educative value of competitions, which have been indeed the ladder by which the success of the festival has been reached.

The festival, so far as the combined performances and concerts are concerned, is specially reported in the Musical Times, p. 378.

We give below a list of the entries for the competitions and a statement of the principal results. Mr. Ivor Atkins was the chief adjudicator, and Mr. G. Rathbone, of Grange-over-Sands, an able musician trained in the Royal College of Music, assisted in the sight-singing sections. Miss Caroline Bigge was the official accompanist. The services of Mr. C. T. Cropper as platform director must be admirably acknowledged. Others who were prominent and useful were Mrs. Argles, the conductor of the children's concert, and the general honorary secretaries, Messrs. Colin and Gordon Somervell.

The following adult choirs competed in various sections (mixed-voice, part-songs, madrigal, female-voice, male-voice and sight-reading):

Appleby (Mr. Godfrey Brown).
Ambleside (Mr. W. Rawling).
Burneside and Staveley Choral Union (Mrs. A. H. Willink).
Burton (Mr. J. Atkinson).
Highgate Room Class (Miss Cattriss).
Kendal Parish Church District (Mrs. A. H. Willink).
Kirkby Stephen (Mr. J. Stewart).
Windermere (Mr. G. Somervell).
Yealand (Mr. J. H. R. Dixon).
Arnside (Mr. L. Barton).
Carnforth (Mr. E. E. Unsworth).
Cartmel (Mr. Kendall).
Carnforth Congregational (Mr. T. Rathbone).
Cark (Miss H. Stamper).
Grange (Mr. L. Barton).
Heversham, Levens, and Milnthorpe Choral Union (Mrs. Argles).
Kirkby Lonsdale (Dr. Paget-Tomlinson).
Leck (Mr. H. E. P. Welch).
Milnthorpe Carol (Miss A. Reade).
Sedburgh (Mr. P. A. Thomas).

The chief tests in the adult classes were 'Elfin music' (Bantock), 'Christ, our Helper and Life Giver' (Bach), 'So soft and warm' (Cornelius), 'Cuckow' (Anon.), 'The winter is past' (Somervell), 'Hark, hark, the lark' (Walker), 'As torrents in summer' (Elgar), 'Who shall win my lady fair' (Pearsall), 'Flora gave me fairest flowers' (Wilbye), and 'O peaceful night' (German).

The winning choirs were Kendal Parish Church (ladies'), Ambleside, Carnforth, Arnside, Heversham and Milnthorpe Choral Union, and Kirkby Lonsdale.

The following junior choirs competed in various sections (piece from concert music, voice production in boys' choir and girls' choir sections, sight-reading, boy's solo and in pace-choir):

Ambleside (Mr. Rawling).
Burneside (Mr. Legge).
Endmoor (Miss E. Cookson).
Heversham (Miss I. Slinger).
Howard Orphan Home (Miss L. Walker).
Kendal Green British (Mr. Gardiner).
Kendal Parish Church, Girls' (Miss Gornall).
Kendal Central (Mr. Bell).
Levens (Miss Pennington).
Milnthorpe (Miss Alice Reade).
Preston Patrick (Miss E. Cookson).

The programme sung at the concert by the combined choirs, from which the test-pieces were chosen, included Scotch and English national songs, 'Sunshine,' by E. M. Boyce, and a group of rounds. The winning choirs were Ambleside, Kendal Boys' Central, Levens and Milnthorpe Girls'.

SWALEDALE (THIRSK).

April 27, 28.

For the last five or six years the Swaledale 'Tournament of Song' has been held at Northallerton or Richmond, and its first visit to Thirsk aroused considerable interest. Mr. Harry Evans and Mr. C. H. Moody adjudicated.

In the juvenile choral contests the winners were Sowerby St. Oswald's Girls' School, Northallerton C.S., Northallerton C.E. Boys' School, Hutton Bonville, and Thirsk C.E. School.

Choirs from Hutton Bonville, Danby Wiske, and Northallerton Congregational were successful in classes for sacred choral music. Ingley Arncliffe were first, Danby Wiske second, and Hutton Bonville third out of five entries in a competition for village choral societies. The chief choral contests resulted as follows:—

FEMALE-VOICE.

Test: 'Orpheus with his lute' (German).

Mowbray.

Entente Cordiale.

Equal (Northallerton Musical Society (Mr. Castle).

2nd. Richmond (Mr. Brown).

1st. Thirsk (Mr. A. J. Todd).

3rd. Brompton and Northallerton, P.M.

Ingley Arncliffe.

MALE-VOICE.

Test: 'Tally-ho' (Lee Williams).

1st. Northallerton.

2nd. Thirsk.

Mutual Male-voice Choir.

MIXED-VOICE.

Test: 'The sea hath its pearls' (Pinsuti).

3rd. Northallerton Musical Society.

Mowbray Chorus.

Zion Glee Party.

Ingley Arncliffe.

1st. Thirsk.

2nd. Brompton and Northallerton P.M.

SIGHT READING.

Northallerton Musical Society.

Prizes were won by the Zephyr Male-voice Quartet, Northallerton; Frenchgate Mixed-voice Quartet; Miss D. Dodsworth's Instrumental Trio and Quartet parties; Miss D. Payne-Galloway (pianoforte); Miss Eveline Connell (accompanying at sight); Miss Gertrude Brown (violin playing and solo sight-singing).

BURY MUSICAL FESTIVAL.

April 28, 29, 30.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

Bury—with its early associations with Peel, Cobden and John Bright; possessed of quite a notable art-gallery, rivaling in many respects those of towns twice or thrice its size; rejoicing in the possession of many public-spirited citizens—is admirably situated in the midst of communities noted from the days of John Wesley for their love of song, and it is gratifying to find those responsible for the policy of the competitive movement here deliberately setting out to achieve, within their own borders so to speak, a thorough musical revival. Here the competitions are practically 'close' ones. They do not want the 'crack' choirs of Lancashire: they do want and do get the less capable ones, and if the improvement manifested in the past two years is consistently maintained, these will speedily join the ranks of the elect. This musical redemption of their district brings its own reward, and it is a moot point whether a festival executive does not deserve most praise for this sort of work. Of course, it is nice to have the tip-top choirs coming to your festival, but there has been in Lancashire, perhaps, somewhat of a temptation to have great 'open' classes, with choirs from all parts of the country thronging their halls. If this sort of thing can be done simultaneously with the development of one's own immediate locality, well and good, but if not, then Bury and its executive have chosen the better part; in time their efforts will swell the ranks of the first-rate choirs and so the heaven will spread, for each town may develop its own resources. A systematic adoption of such methods as Bury's would be productive of untold good.

Elgar's 'The Reveille,' which was chosen as a test in the chief male-voice choral competition, was finely sung by the Todmorden Choir (Mr. Harold Lees), who outclassed the Manchester Mendelssohn Choir (Mr. Arthur Lomax). Six mixed-voice choirs sang Brahms's 'In silent night' and Coleridge-Taylor's 'Dead in the Sierras,' and for their highly expressive interpretation, Sale and District (Mr. Alfred Higson) deserved and won the first position. The second prize was won by Salford (Mr. F. W. Blacow); the other entrants were Walsden Co-operative (Mr. Harold Lees), Rawtenstall (Mr. Ernest Horne), Gorton Parish Church (Mr. E. Fennah), and Stretford (Mr. Thomas Corlett). Salford were first and New Road (Mr. George Webb) second in the female-voice section, for which Macdowell's 'Summer wind' and Weekes's 'The nightingale' were employed as tests.

In competitions for choirs from places of worship, successes were gained by New Road Congregational (Mr. George Webb) and Wesley Choir, Sale (Mr. Alfred Higson). The solo prize-winners included Miss Sarah E. Smith (soprano), Mr. J. Butterworth (bass), Mr. William Alfred Heys (pianoforte), and the Sale and District Mixed-voice Quartet.

Mr. Harry Evans adjudicated.

NORTH-WEST NORFOLK (HUNSTANTON).

May 2.

The Association of North-West Norfolk Village Choirs held their thirteenth annual festival in the Town Hall, Hunstanton, with success.

The mixed-voice choral contests were divided into three classes distinguished by the size of the villages represented. The tests included Dowland's 'Now, O now, I needs must part,' Wood's 'The Chase,' Byrd's 'While the bright sun,' and Eaton Fanning's 'Moonlight.' The winning choirs were Holkham (Mr. A. S. Brabham), Thornham (Mr. W. H. Elsum), and Hunstanton (Mr. E. E. Watson). In an open class for female-voice choirs the tests were 'June Roses' (Schumann) and 'Rest thee on this mossy pillow' (Smart); Hunstanton were first by a considerable margin. A 'Novice' class for choirs that had never won, drew only one entry, Holkham. Mr. Harry Evans adjudicated.

In the children's classes, 'Out in the sunshine' (Pinsuti) was the prescribed piece; the second piece, which could be either action- or part-song, was left to the choirs' own choice. But there was no competition. The choirs simply sang their pieces to one another. Some sight-tests in two-parts, written by Mr. Keene, the organist at Sandringham, were considered by the teachers to be too difficult.

BRISTOL.

May 2 to 7.

At the eighth annual Eisteddfod, Dr. Coward, Mr. E. T. Davies, Mr. York Bowen and Mr. T. B. Knott were the adjudicators. Among a considerable number of solo classes one for pianoforte-playing deserves special mention, as the prize was a £50 pianoforte. This was won by Miss Marion Jones, of Swansea. In the competitions for Council or Voluntary schools, the first-prizes were secured by Greenbank C.S. (Mr. Fred. S. Long) and North Street Wesleyan (Miss E. Cook). In a class for children's choirs Mr. T. Yeo's choir were first and Miss Bradfield's second. The winning adult choirs were: Midsummer Norton (Mr. C. B. Smale) and Bristol Temperance Choral Society (Mr. F. Stone).

ESKDALE (WHITBY).

May 3, 4.

The Eskdale 'Tournament of Song' for the first time occupied two days and demanded the services of two adjudicators. These were Mr. Harry Evans and Mr. Arthur Wilson. Among the solo competitions that for sight-reading (juniors) was worthy of note as it attracted sixteen entries; the winners were A. Crawford and W. Ord, bracketed. Prizes for prepared solo-singing were won by Miss L. Sibby (contralto, seven entries), and Mr. W. Garbutt (tenor, nineteen entries).

In the school competitions, Farndale gained a prize for unison singing; Guisborough for part-singing, with a word of special commendation from Mr. Evans; Aislaby for action-song; and Guisborough Providence Girls' for sight-reading.

Three church choirs for men and boys, of whom Saltburn Parish Church proved the best, sang Wesley's 'Wash me thoroughly.' Skelton Parish Church were the best of six mixed-voice church choirs who sang Mendelssohn's 'How lovely are the messengers.' The tests, entries and results in the chief choral competitions were as follows:

MIXED-VOICE.

- Test: 'The sea hath its pearls' (Pinsuti).
1st. Saltburn Glee Society.
Danby and District Choral Society.
3rd. Whitby Musical Union.
2nd. Pickering Choral Society.

FEMALE-VOICE.

- Test: 'Encinctured with a twine of leaves' (Coleridge-Taylor).

- 3rd. Fylingdales.
2nd. Brunswick.
Pickering.
1st. Whitby Primitive Methodist.
Saltburn Glee Society.
West Cliff Congregational.

MALE-VOICE.

- Test: 'Life's crown is love' (R. Schumann).
Whitby Parish Church.
Danby.
2nd. Bohemian.
3rd. Pickering.
1st. The Concordia.
Brotton Parish Church.

Prizes were won by a combined junior violin class from Whitby, who played the March from Costa's 'Eli,' and by Mrs. Kirk's Orchestra, Pickering, who played Wuerst's 'Sous le balcon.'

MORECAMBE FESTIVAL.

May 4, 5, 6, 7.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

This was the twentieth meeting at Morecambe. As Canon Gorton wrote in the foreword to the Festival programme:—'Next year we come of age. The steady growth of the movement permits, I hope, some flourish of trumpets. The syllabus of what we boldly called the "second annual music competition" included five classes; these have now extended to forty, and a single fly-leaf has grown into a book of forty-six pages! We purpose to celebrate our coming of age by inviting those interested in the festival to assist us in choosing the music from the programmes of past years.' If in England at the time, Sir Edward Elgar has promised to be present, and Dr. McNaught and Dr. Walford Davies are also to be present.

This year's festival was shorn of much of its attractiveness by the sudden cancellation of all the 'open' competitions on the last day, owing to the death of King Edward.

The festival opened with a choral celebration in the Church of St. Laurence, Mr. S. H. Nicholson, organist of Manchester Cathedral, conducting nine church choirs drawn from the surrounding districts. Mr. Percy Smale was at the organ. On May 5, over a score of local choirs, mainly drawn from the Vale of Lune and Wyresdale, along with two from villages of under 500 inhabitants, occupied the whole of the daytime. Instrumental trios and quartets attracted half-a-dozen entries, the subjects being Hummel's E flat trio (No. 1) and the Haydn quartet (Op. 76, No. 4). The local male-voice choirs had two very stiff choruses to prepare—Fedor Berger's 'Song of the Pied Piper' and Hugo Kaun's 'Praise God,' both of which had been translated for the occasion by Canon Gorton. They were much too difficult for such local choirs to do them anything like justice, and would have been put to better use had they been included amongst the music chosen for the 'open' classes on the concluding day. Thursday evening's proceedings were partly competitions and partly concert. Mendelssohn's 'Psalm xcv.' was sung by a local choir of 400 voices, thirteen different contingents being massed under Mr. Smale's control. Mr. F. Crowe's Lancaster orchestra played the accompaniments, and gave a most creditable performance of the 'Oberon' overture. Mr. Webster Millar sang several groups of lieder and two new songs by Mr. Smale, the secretary of this festival. Elgar's unison marching-song 'Follow the colours' was sung by the 5th King's Own Territorials, and the Morecambe Madrigal Society sang two choral songs by Mr. J. W. G. Hathaway, probably for the first time in these parts.

Children's day brought the first really full attendance, and the day's performances reached a high standard. Skipton and Caton particularly distinguished themselves in the 'Maypole' class. The senior action-song enabled those indefatigable Preston children to turn 'There was an old woman who lived in a shoe' to admirable account. How ingeniously it was worked out! The 'Red Cross Brigade' of the Caton Choir had a most serious, not to say gloomy, side to it; the ambulance 'properties' lent realistic touches.

The concert programme on the children's day included the new junior cantata 'Jack Horner's ride,' composed by Dr. Joseph Hathaway and conducted by the composer. The performance was a remarkably good one, the choir of several hundred young vocalists singing the work entirely from memory. The music is very lively and the libretto entertaining. Miss Maggie Shaw took the part of the Lady and Master F. Mason was a capital Jack Horner.

News of King Edward's death reached Morecambe soon after Friday midnight. The authorities worked hard through the night, conveying to all the choirs and orchestras who should have taken part in the final day's proceedings, that, as the festival was held in licensed premises, the Winter Gardens, there was no option but to postpone the 'open' classes until June 18, when it is hoped all the original entrants as well as the adjudicators will be able to attend.

The chief results in the competitions were as follows:—

GIRLS' FRIENDLY SOCIETIES.

(Challenge banner class.)

- 1st. Morecambe (Miss R. Duff).
- 2nd. Lancaster (Miss Lilian Brash).

MALE-VOICE CHOIRS.

(Two local classes, six entries in each.)

- Carnforth Choral Society (Mr. E. E. Unsworth).
- Burton Choral Society (Mr. John Atkinson).

MALE-VOICE CHOIRS (local).

- Settle Choral Society (Mr. Frederick Lord).

MIXED-VOICE CHOIRS (local villages).

- Clapham (Mr. J. F. Constantine).

(Other local choirs, six entries.)

- 1st. Hornby Glee Class (Miss G. M. Illidge).
- 2nd. Chatburn and Downham (Mr. F. H. Wood).

(Chief local class, seven entries.)

- 1st. Carnforth (Mr. E. E. Unsworth).
- 2nd. Morecambe, Clarence Street (Mr. Cooper).
- 3rd. Benthams Musical Society (Mr. J. F. Constantine).

CHORAL SIGHT-READING.

- 1st. Carnforth.
- 2nd. Burton.

In the challenge shield class for elementary schools, Morecambe Central (Mr. Stoddard) were first; Hesketh-with-Beconsall C.E. (Mr. T. Wilson) second; Morecambe National (Mr. J. T. Procter) third. In other juvenile competitions, first prizes were secured by Bolton-le-Sands C.E. (Miss A. E. Taberner), Heaton St. Barnabas, Bradford (Mr. J. H. Wilkinson), Heaton Parish Church Choir Boys, Bradford (Mr. C. M. Rooks), and Skipton, Broughton Street (Mr. A. Townshend).

The adjudicators were Professor Granville Bantock, Mr. Frederick Corder, Mr. S. H. Nicholson, Mr. T. Tertius Noble, Dr. J. W. G. Hathaway, Mr. C. H. Fogg, and Miss E. Robinson.

The Times said: 'The culmination of this children's festival was a cantata "Jack Horner's ride," by Dr. Hathaway, who was one of the judges, and who conducted the performance of his music, which is well suited for its purpose, being tuneful and rhythmical and at the same time full of touches of refined musicianship. The combined choirs formed a huge chorus, which sang from memory and with unflinching spirit, while the children who assumed the principal characters enacted their parts with an intelligence that made one feel what wonderful possibilities a sympathetic and inspiring teacher may discover in a child of fair average intelligence.'

ALEXANDRA PALACE (HERTS AND NORTH MIDDLESEX).

May 5, 6, 7.

This great festival appeals very successfully to the northern districts and suburbs of London. The chief results were as follows:—

Soprano.—Miss Florence Laing.

Mezzo-soprano.—Miss Betty Grylls.

Contralto.—Mrs. G. C. Turner.

Tenor.—Mr. Alfred Fowler.

Baritone.—Mr. Edward Thompson.

Bass.—Mr. C. H. Cunningham.

Boys' solo (45 entries).—Harold Cutbush.

Pianoforte solo (junior classes).—Miss Betty Grieve, Miss Violet Boyton, Master C. A. Bedells, and Miss Sylvia Knudsen.

Pianoforte solo (senior).—Mr. G. T. Ball.

Violoncello.—Miss Helen Pearce.

Violin (senior).—Miss Dorothy Pearson.

Instrumental trio (senior).—Mrs. W. Greenwood's party.

String quartet.—Messrs. E. Stuart-Smith's party.

In the open competition for mixed-voice choirs the tests were Weekes's madrigal 'As Vesta was descending' and Brahms's 'Vineta.' Hertford Festival Choir (Mr. J. L. Gregory) gained a victory over Essendine (Mr. W. Kendall) and Canning Hall, Clerkenwell (Mr. A. J. Franklin). The open class for ladies' choirs attracted a choir from Coventry, the Wheatly Street Institute (Mrs. L. R. O. Petty), who carried off the chief honours; separated from them by one mark were Mr. Passmore's Tufnell Park Choir; Madame Grace Day-Winter's Choir secured third place. The tests were Schumann's 'Sinks the night' and Lassen's 'Spanish Gipsy Girl.' Eight choirs sang Elgar's 'Yea, cast me from heights' and Cornelius's 'Riders' song' were prescribed in the open male-voice class; the first prize went to the Peel Male-voice Choir (Mr. T. C. Hamersley).

In three classes for choral societies within the area nine choirs entered, of whom those successful were Welwyn and District (Mr. Thomas Hassard), Hertingfordbury (Mr. James R. Kennerell), and Bayford (Mr. Morgan Biles). Four classes for choirs from Places of Worship resulted in victories for St. Luke's, West Holloway (Mr. B. J. Dale), St. Paul's, Mill Hill (Mr. A. E. Winny), Essendon Church (Mr. E. M. Sheehan), and Crouch End Congregational (Mr. Josiah Booth). Out of eleven entries in a contest for Madrigal Societies, Mill Hill (Dr. E. Markham Lee) were first, Hertford Festival and Hertingfordbury equal second; the tests were Croce's 'Cynthia, thy song enchanting' and Stanford's 'Phoebe.' Other successes were gained by East Finchley Brotherhood (Mr. H. Wooding Monk), and Mr. Passmore's Ladies' Choir, Tufnell Park.

In two competitions for choirs from L.C.C. Evening Continuation Schools, the entries (in programme order) and results were as follows:—

MIXED-VOICES.

Tests: 'The knight's tomb' (Stanford); and 'Come away, sweet love' (Rathbone).

- Eglinton Road, Plumstead (Mr. Edward Gibson Davis).
Upper Hornsey Road (Mr. Harry Smith).
Essendine, Paddington (Mr. W. Kendall).
Cranford Street, Camberwell (Mr. Frank Lowden).
Millfields Road, Clapton (Mr. A. Morgan).
1st. Queen's Road Evening Commercial School, Dalston (Mr. Walter Penn).
Kingsgate Road, West Hampstead (Mr. Frank Lowden).

FEMALE-VOICES.

Tests: 'From the green heart of the waters' (Coleridge-Taylor); and 'Triumph of Fate' (Purcell).

- Queen's Road Evening Commercial School (Mr. Walter Penn).
Cranford Street, Camberwell (Mr. Frank Lowden).
1st. Upper Hornsey Road (Mr. Harry Smith).

Choirs from larger elementary schools sang, in four classes, Purcell's 'Nymphs and shepherds' and the Round 'Wind, gentle evergreen.' The four first-prize winners—

- Chase Side C.S., Enfield (Mr. Harry D. Vincent)
Albert Street C.S., N. Finchley (Mr. Harold Preston)
Campsbourne C.S., Hornsey (Miss B. D. G. Moffat)
Bayford (Mr. Morgan Biles)

and two second-prize winners—

- Stroud Green C.S. (Mr. Charles Rowley)
Croxley Green Girls' School (Miss Anne Clarke)
met again in a Challenge Competition for a Broadwood pianoforte, the test being Lloyd's 'Twelve by the clock.' Campsbourne were successful.

Adjudicators: Dr. Arthur Somervell, Dr. Henry Coward, Dr. P. C. Buck, Mr. Alfred Gibson, Mr. W. E. Whitehouse, Mr. J. Dykes, Mr. Daniel Price, Mr. James Bates, Mr. William Shakespeare, Mr. G. D. Cunningham, Mr. W. McNaught, jun. The hon. secretary of the festival is Miss Cecilia Hill, of Wentworth Hall, Mill Hill.

BERKS, BUCKS AND OXON.

May 7, 9, 10, 11, 12.

This festival appeals largely to a country population. It is so well supported by the elementary schools that the junior section of the competitions has to be much sub-divided. The elementary schools whose choirs won first prizes were: Albury and Tiddington (Miss Ballard), Beaconsfield C.E. (Mr. Baker), Central School, Langley (Mr. E. Swell), Tonman-Mosley C.S., Slough (Mr. A. W. Proctor). Among non-elementary schools Kendrick Girls', Reading (Mr. Scrivener) were the best. Datchet King's Messengers (Mr. Britten) obtained first place in a class for children's choirs, Sunday School choirs, &c., and Coleshill C.E. in a class for elementary school teachers in which Rubinstein's 'The Angel' was prescribed. Beaconsfield G.F.S. (Miss Blunt) were successful in a class for girls' clubs; the test was Schumann's 'Old mill beloved.'

The chief tests in the junior classes were: 'The owl' (Parry), 'The fairy cobbler' (Horrocks), 'The sea' (Harwood), 'Wilt thou lend me thy mare' (Nares), 'When young leaves are springing' (C. Wood), 'Robin redbreast' (Stanford) and 'The Lamb' (Walford Davies); there were also sight-reading tests.

In the chief female-voice choral contest Dr. Vaughan Williams's 'Sound asleep' was the test and Oxford ladies' (Mr. A. C. Boulton) the winning choir; in another female-voice class Beaconsfield (Rev. A. S. Commeline) were first. The Rev. B. C. S. Everett's Choir, Windsor, were successful in the male-voice section.

Four classes were open to Church choirs; in each class one of the tests was a well-known hymn to be chosen by the adjudicator. The winning choirs were St. Michael-and-All Angels, Hughenden (Mr. Britnell), Saunderton Parish (Rev. L. Packer), George Street Congregational, Oxford (Mr. Phillips), and Holy Trinity Parish Church, Windsor (Mr. Clapham). In the three mixed-voice choir competitions the Rev. B. C. S. Everett's Choir, Windsor, Islip Choral Society (Mr. Annis) and Mrs. Commeline's Choir were the prize-winners. The tests were: 'His golden locks' (Dowland), 'Down in a flow'ry vale' (Festa) and 'My bonny lass she smileth' (Morley).

There were also competitions for vocal and instrumental solos, duets, &c. In the orchestral classes Wycombe Abbey School String Orchestra (Miss I. Gibson) and Beaconsfield Orchestral Society (Miss Blount) were successful.

The adjudicators were: Dr. Walford Davies, Dr. Varley Roberts, Mr. Basil Johnson, Mr. J. S. Little and Mr. J. Dykes.

DUBLIN.

May 9 to 14.

The Feis Ceoil, or Irish Musical Festival, has been the chief event of the month in Dublin. The postponement of the orchestral concert (arranged for May 11), owing to the death of the King, naturally deprived the festival of much of its interest, as a considerable portion of Wagner's 'Ringgold' was to have been performed. The competitions, however, attracted large audiences. The entries for the solo-singing competitions alone numbered 300.

Prizes for solo singing were won by Miss Kathleen McCully, Miss Muriel Aske, Miss Nellie Moore, Miss Florence Cahill, Miss B. L'Estrange Graham, Mr. Edmond O'Sullivan, Mr. Arthur McCallum, Mr. Patrick Maloney, and (for sight-singing) Miss Sylvia McCready. The senior instrumental solo prizes were taken by Miss Edith Kelly (violin), Miss Lilian Dowse (violinello), Mr. George O'Neill (pianoforte), and Mr. Thomas J. H. Kerr. Mr. Jack Oulton's Mixed-voice Quartet, St. Columba's Male Quartet, and Miss Madalene Mooney's String Quartet also gained successes.

In the chief choral competitions the test-pieces, entries, and results were as follows:—

MIXED-VOICES.

Tests: 'Hymn to music' (Dudley Buck), 'Ye that do live' (Wilbye), and 'O'Sullivan Mor' (arr. by Jozé).

- 2nd. Dublin Glee Singers (Mr. Joseph Seymour).
Phibsboro' Glee Singers (Mr. J. B. Van Craen).
1st. Maiden City Choir (Dr. D. C. Jones).

FEMALE VOICES.

Tests: (a) 'The mountain spirit' (Adolph Jensen); (b) 'The messengers of peace' ('Rienzi') (Wagner).

- Leinster School of Music (Madame Quinton-Rosse).
Thomastown Musical Society (Dr. Herbert M'Clelland).
1st. Miss Culwick's Ladies' Choir.
Dublin Glee Singers (Mr. Joseph Seymour).
2nd. Maiden City Choir (Dr. D. C. Jones).
Brian Boru Ladies' Choir (Mr. W. McGouran).
Bangor (Mr. Robert Jones).

MALE VOICES.

- Dublin Guild of Meistersingers (Mr. P. P. Walsh).
2nd. Æolian Glee Singers (Mr. W. McGouran).
Iona (Mr. Theodore Logier).
1st. Maiden City (Dr. D. C. Jones).

In the less advanced choral competitions the prizes were won by Thomastown Musical Society (Dr. Herbert McClelland), Augustinian Male-Voice (Mr. Van Craen), Loreto College Choir (Mrs. McCabe), and St. Mary's Girls' School (Miss Mary Dardis).

The adjudicators were: Mr. T. Tertius Noble, Signor Denza, Mr. Sigmund Beel and Signor Albanesi.

DORSET (WEYMOUTH).

May 10.

Twenty-four choirs of the Dorset Choral Association took part in this choral festival. There were eight classes, in which the prizes were won by Sherborne (Mr. Hodgson), Bank Buildings Baptist, Weymouth (Mr. Rendell), St. John's, Weymouth, Holwell Combined Choirs (Mr. Tester), Evershot (Mr. George), Charminster (Mr. Lane), Weymouth Glee Party (Mr. Crocker), and Weymouth Pupil Teachers' Centre (Mr. Babb). The test-pieces included 'The Battle of the Baltic' (Lloyd), 'O Gladstone Light', 'If I had but two little wings' (Parry), 'The boat song' (Cowen), 'The pilgrims' (Leslie), 'Hymn before action' (Walford Davies), 'In absence' (Dudley Buck), 'Evening rest' (Herring), and 'Jack Frost' (Hatton). Mr. Harry Evans adjudicated.

We are compelled to hold over reports of competitions at Weybridge, Worcester, and other centres.

Musical score for "The Death of the Little Girl" by Robert Schumann. The score is in 3/4 time and consists of six staves. The first five staves are for voices (Soprano, Alto, Tenor, Bass, and Piano) and the sixth staff is for the Piano accompaniment. The lyrics are: "creep to death, creep to death, . . . creep to death, . . . creep to death, . . . creep to death, . . . creep to death, . . . creep to death, . . .". The score includes dynamic markings such as dim. (diminuendo) and p (piano). The tempo is marked "Andante".

BRAIN TO KEYBOARD.

VALUE OF THE COURSE.

A Mus. Bac. writes: "I would not be without your exercises for ten times the fee."Another Mus. Bac. says: "I am fully satisfied that I have never spent three guineas to greater advantage in all my musical life."

OTHER PUPILS say:

"The £3 3s. is the best outlay I have ever made in my efforts to learn the piano.""Your course is worth far more than a great many 'quarters' of lessons—in the ordinary sense of the word—put together."

"I consider your lessons a splendid return for the money."

"I would have spent three times as much by the ordinary methods to have obtained the same execution, not to mention the great saving in time."

"I have never spent three guineas to better purpose in my life."

M. MACDONALD SMITH, 19, BLOOMSBURY SQUARE, LONDON, W.C.

To Play Music at Sight.

The inability to play music at first sight is the great stumbling-block with nearly all pianists, whether they be advanced students or mere beginners. The accompanying extracts will convince you that with the aid of my System it is not difficult to acquire the ability to play even the most advanced music at first sight.
The System involves little more than fifteen minutes' daily practising for three months. The results are certain and, within your technical abilities, you will find no piece too difficult to play at first sight. Hundreds of students have taken my Course of Correspondence Lessons with remarkable success.

The improvement in my reading powers is, literally, stupendous.

A. T. (Royston).

I am thoroughly well satisfied with the results obtained from your System, which gives all you claim for it.

O. R. (Hull).

My improvement has been most satisfactory, and I am more than satisfied.

A. E. R. (Roundhay).

Your excellent System has helped me immensely. Am more than satisfied with the progress I have made.

E. M. (Richmond).

There are no special difficulties to report—nothing but success.

A. W. (Weston-super-Mare).

I have nothing but praise for your method.

W. H. L. (London, S.W.).

I am delighted with the progress I have made.

J. R. R. (St. Columb).

Nothing I have played lately has given me trouble.

R. R. (Dingwall, N.B.).

I might just mention that my sister complimented me on reading at sight her accompaniment, just after your first lesson.

E. T. H. (Fulham, S.W.).

THE EHREMYER SYSTEM OF PIANOFORTE SIGHT-PLAYING.

ANTONIO STRADIVARI

HIS LIFE AND WORK (1644-1737)

BY

W. Henry Hill, Arthur F. Hill, F.S.A.,
and Alfred E. Hill.

A NEW AND CHEAPER EDITION.

This Book contains the whole of the original text and most of the illustrations, with the difference that the coloured plates have been replaced by photographic reproductions. On the other hand, however, it includes an additional illustration in colours, by way of frontispiece, of the celebrated Stradivari Violin, known as "The Messie."

In reviewing the earlier edition, The Times said: "That the authors were well qualified for the task is plain. They belong to a family in which violin making has been traditional for generations, they have been aided by the family lore and guided by wide and varied experience. Thus equipped, they have devoted themselves to a careful examination and comparison of the great maker's instruments, and the list cited justifies the conclusion that there can be few which have escaped their notice. The same journal refers to the book as "the most important contribution yet made to the history of the great fiddle-maker and his work."

ROBERT SCHUMANN.

BORN JUNE 8, 1810.

DIED JULY 29, 1856.

It does not appear that the ancestors, near or remote, of Robert Schumann, displayed any special aptitude for music. His father, Friedrich Schumann, had literary tastes, and although forced by circumstances to adopt a mercantile career—for a time he was a grocer and later a bookseller—he contrived to indulge his tastes as well as to amass a fair competence that left him some leisure. Robert's mother was the daughter of Herr Schrabel, the town physician of Zeitz. From all that is young Schumann's prospects. A scheme to send him to Carl Maria von Weber in Dresden fell through, and he remained in Zwickau until 1828, studying and making music in a desultory fashion. When he was nine years of age he heard Moscheles play at Carlsbad, and was deeply impressed. In 1828 Schumann matriculated at Leipsic University. Before settling down in that town for a period of study he went for a short tour in South Germany with a student friend named Rosen. At Bayreuth he saw the house in which Jean Paul (already one of his gods) had died in 1825, and at Munich he had the rare felicity of spending some hours with the poet Heine. As his parents had all along designed him for the law, he returned to Leipsic to resume his studies. But these studies were repugnant to his temperament and yearnings, and it was during this period that he showed symptoms of the gloominess and taciturnity which oppressed him more or less throughout his life and in the end overpowered his better self.

THE HOUSE AT ZWICKAU, SAXONY, IN WHICH SCHUMANN WAS BORN
ON JUNE 8, 1810.

known of her character, it would seem that Robert inherited from her his warmth of feeling and remarkable romantic temperament. Robert was the youngest of five children. He was born at Zwickau, a picturesque manufacturing town in Saxony, on June 8, 1810. A picture of the house in which he was born is given above. When he was six years of age he showed signs of exceptional musical capacity, and he then began to take pianoforte lessons from Kuntsch, a local musician. It says much for Kuntsch's penetration that he soon discovered that he had to deal with a genius; with prophetic instinct he declared that the boy would become a great and immortal musician. The death of his father, in 1826, was a severe trial, but as a reasonable income for the family was assured the sad event did not materially affect

In 1828—the year of Schubert's death—Schumann first met Friedrich Wieck (1785-1873), who was then a pianoforte teacher of great repute. This connection, as all the world knows, was destined to have a most profound effect on Schumann's life. Wieck gave Schumann lessons, and apparently made his influence felt on his pupil's technique. But in February, 1829, Wieck was compelled from lack of time to discontinue the course. It was during this period that Schumann first made the acquaintance of Wieck's daughter Clara, then a girl of ten years of age, who was already displaying that marvellous skill which, when fully developed, placed her in the front rank of the world's pianists. Schumann next went to Heidelberg, still ostensibly with a view to the study of the law. Here he met Thibaut, whose sage reflections on the philosophy of his art and its existing condition no doubt greatly interested Schumann. The easy-going discipline at Heidelberg University helped the world to lose a bad lawyer and to gain a great musician. The prospect of a career as a composer and pianoforte virtuoso dominated Schumann's thoughts and governed the disposition of his time. He practised the pianoforte seven hours a day, and in addition exercised his muscles on a dumb keyboard. A letter to his mother, dated July 1, 1830, 4 a.m., affords a glimpse of his hard-working habits. He says :

I get up early, work from four to seven, sit at the piano from seven to nine, and am then off to Thibaut. The afternoon is divided between lectures and lessons, or reading of English and Italian ; the evening I spend with friends or out of doors.*

He omits to mention the time devoted to sleep.

In 1829 he made alone an excursion into Italy, and whilst there he heard the great violinist Paganini, whose Caprices for the violin he subsequently arranged for pianoforte solo (Op. 3 and 10.) Later, at Heidelberg, he endeavoured to resume the study of jurisprudence, but it was all against the grain. Being now twenty years of age it was necessary to decide his profession. His mother, who all along had been averse to his embarking on a musical career, now consented to leave the decision to Wieck, whose dubiousness gave way to Schumann's pleadings. The law was abandoned, and Schumann settled again at Leipsic and resumed his pianoforte studies under Wieck. His zeal for rapid progress now led him to try what turned out to be a disastrous experiment. He employed mechanical means to keep his third finger up whilst the other fingers were exercised, with the dire result that his right hand was crippled. The injury was eventually mitigated, but the third finger was permanently useless. All hopes of becoming a pianoforte virtuoso had to be given up, and composition seemed to be the only avenue to fame open to the young musician. So far his theoretical studies had been unsystematic and superficial, but he had faith in his creative powers. He now studied harmony and composition under Heinrich Dorn, who was a very capable musician resident in Leipsic, and he entered with zest into the varied musical life of the town. In 1833, Ludwig Schunke, a solo pianist, came to Leipsic, and he and Schumann soon became close friends. It was with Schunke and other ardent young musicians that Schumann devised the idea of starting a critical musical journal that would improve much that was considered unsatisfactory in the condition of music in Germany. The scheme was realised, and on April 3, 1834, the first weekly number of the Neue Zeitschrift für Musik was published by Hartmann at Leipsic. Schumann wrote copiously for the journal for about ten years, but after that period his only notable contribution was the justly celebrated article entitled 'Neue Bahnen' (New paths), in which he proclaimed the genius of Brahms. This appeared in the number issued on October 28, 1853. Its generosity and insight recall the oft-quoted exclamation of Schumann with reference to Chopin : 'Hats off, gentlemen ; a genius !' It was through his searching criticisms in the Neue Zeitschrift as well as by his compositions that Schumann preached the gospel of Romanticism in musical art with which his name is indelibly connected. As the value of Schumann's work as a critic is assessed by Mr. Ernest Newman in another section of this article, we need not dwell further on the matter here.

The editing of the Neue Zeitschrift by no means completely absorbed Schumann's energies. Some of the best of his pianoforte music was composed during his period of connection with the journal. These works include the Fantasia (Op. 17), the F minor Sonata (Op. 14), and the Fantasiestücke (Op. 12).

In 1835 Mendelssohn came to reside at Leipsic, and his great influence soon stirred all the musical forces of the city into activity. He naturally formed a close acquaintance with Schumann, and the relations of the two musicians were cordial and based on mutual esteem. Schumann was in fact an ardent admirer of Mendelssohn's music, but there is no evidence that Mendelssohn similarly appreciated Schumann's music.

We now reach a period of intense interest in Schumann's career. His frequent visits to the Wiecks resulted in his forming a passionate attachment to Clara. The affection was reciprocated, but Wieck, the father, obstinately opposed the union on the ground of the uncertainty of Schumann's prospects in life. The story is a long and absorbingly interesting one, especially as it is revealed in Schumann's published letters.† It must suffice here to record that as Wieck's consent to the union could not be obtained, application was made to the law courts to legalize the marriage in spite of the parental refusal. Leave was granted, and the marriage took place on September 12, 1840. Later, accepting the inevitable, Wieck became reconciled to the couple.

Up to this period, Schumann had composed chiefly for the pianoforte, the only notable exception being a Symphony in G minor, which was withdrawn on the ground of its failure. He now devoted his powers to vocal music, and the larger symphonic forms. In the year 1840 he composed no fewer than one hundred songs, and in 1841 he composed the B flat Symphony (Op. 38), and that in D minor, which was afterwards revised and published as Op. 120. A third work of symphonic proportions, the Overture, Scherzo and Finale (Op. 52), and the first movement of the well-known Pianoforte concerto in A minor saw light in this happy and fruitful year. Chamber music next occupied Schumann's attention, and one of the most important creations of this period was the famous Pianoforte quintet (Op. 44). In 1843 he composed what many critics consider to be the most important and beautiful of his choral works, 'Paradise and the Peri,' a setting of an adaptation of Moore's 'Lalla Rookh.' A little later he began a choral setting of Goethe's 'Faust.'

In 1844, after a tour in Germany and Russia with his wife, Schumann contemplated a visit to England, but obstacles intervened, and the project was abandoned, never to be revived. It was evident, however, that the idea of coming to this country was attractive to Schumann; and, indeed, at one time he thought of permanently settling here. In 1844 Schumann finally quitted Leipzig and went to reside at Dresden. He was suffering from over-work, and his condition began to excite concern. When, after care and rest, he recovered fair health, he again devoted himself to composition. By 1846 he had completed the C major Symphony (Op. 61). As Wagner was at Dresden during this period, the two musicians often met. Opera now engaged Schumann's mind, and the legend of 'Sainte Geneviève' was chosen as the basis of a libretto. After various vicissitudes, which are very apt to occur in the relations of librettists and composers, the work was completed, and on June 25, 1850, the first performance of 'Genoveva' took place. Other performances followed, but the work excited no enthusiasm, and it has failed to find a niche in the operatic pantheon. The 'Faust' music for concert performance gave much more satisfaction. This was completed and performed in 1848. A powerful work that still holds the field was one of the ripe fruits of this period. It is a setting of Byron's fine poem 'Manfred.' This work was produced on the stage by Liszt at Weimar on June 13, 1852. It is now more frequently given as a concert item. In 1850 Schumann accepted the post of Capellmeister at Düsseldorf, then vacated by Hiller. But although at first partially successful, it was soon evident that Schumann had no special gifts as a conductor, and an ominous return of his malady gradually incapacitated him from such arduous work.

It was at Düsseldorf that the E flat Symphony (known as the third, but strictly the fourth in order of composition), 'The Rhenish,' was composed and performed. It is recorded that he wrote the five movements of this great work between November 2 and December 9, 1850, and the first performance took place at Düsseldorf on February 6, 1851. 'The Pilgrimage of the Rose' (Op. 112) and 'The King's son' (Op. 116) are among the choral works of this period. An oratorio on 'Luther' was seriously contemplated, but never took shape. A Mass (Op. 147) and a Requiem (Op. 148) afforded some vent for Schumann's desire to write sacred choral works.

In 1853 a young musician, armed with an introduction from Joachim, waited on Schumann. The visitor was Brahms, then twenty years old. The result of the acquaintance thus begun has already been noted above.

In 1854 Schumann began again to suffer from distressing fits of depression. On February 27, 1854, during one of these brain storms, he threw himself into the Rhine and was rescued by some boatmen. A short period of calm ensued, during which he completed some Variations on a theme he had dreamt he had derived from Schubert and Mendelssohn. These Variations have not been published, but the theme, with touching appropriateness, has been used by Brahms in his Variations (Op. 23), dedicated to Julie Schumann. Schumann soon relapsed into his depression, with the result that he had to enter a private asylum, where he died in the arms of his wife on July 29, 1856.

What is Schumann's position to-day in the world of music? How does his music appear in the perspective of a half-a-century? Some of the following estimates of Schumann as composer and critic will partially answer these questions.

SCHUMANN AS CRITIC.—BY ERNEST NEWMAN.

If George Henry Lewes's saying that 'the whole man thinks' was ever true of anyone, it was true of Schumann. There is little or nothing in him of that discrepancy between the artist and the man, between the inner and the outer life, that astonishes us in so many other musicians. It is this that gives his letters their peculiar beauty and their touch of pathos. With the sole exception of Beethoven, no musician has ever laboured so consciously to make his art an expression of the best of his life, and to make his life worthy of the best of his art. He is almost more bent on being a good man than on being a good composer. He was, in fact, the true child of his epoch—the Romanticist epoch that came after Goethe's 'Faust'—acutely aware of the warring tendencies in his breast, and eager to resolve that antinomy. Bach, we may be fairly sure, or Haydn, or Mozart, or Gluck, though they had their spiritual problems, were not obsessed by the desire to compose their inner and outer worlds into a higher unity, as Schumann perpetually was. He was pre-eminently introspective, as is sufficiently shown by the mere fact that he gave up so much of his life to talking about music as well as writing it. In this respect, too, he was the symbol of a new order of things in music. The older composers, broadly speaking, confined themselves to the creative side of their art. Bach, Handel, Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven rarely discuss music in general even in their letters, and their total contribution to criticism or æsthetics is negligible. Gluck wrote a good deal, but only in defence or elucidation of his own work. It is only with the Romanticists that a new type appears—that of the composer who is also a man of letters; Weber, perhaps, was the first of them. Even here distinctions have to be made if we would see Schumann in his true light. The vivacious and voluminous Hoffmann was a literary man with a bent towards music rather than a musician turned literary man. Berlioz took to journalism mainly for a living, otherwise he would hardly have taken up the pen for any purpose but to write about himself. Wagner's literary work was almost wholly in elucidation of his own ideas and aspirations. Schumann alone became a critic because it was an urgent need of his to find self-expression in this way. Equally strong in him with the impulse to create new worlds of his own was the desire to know everything that was being done by other men, and to estimate its worth in terms of principles more general than his own bias as a composer. And it was in doing this work that he realised that just as it is hard to attain harmonious unity of life as a man and an artist, so it is hard for the critic to resolve into unity the many beings that seem to have lodgment in his soul. Some standard of judgment obviously must be found if we are not to drift helplessly from one work of art to another, turning a different face to each; yet how to find the standard broad enough and sure enough to be applicable to all the art we are called upon to judge,—something more than the mere temperamental attraction or repulsion of the moment?

Schumann, like the thoughtful critic he was, saw the difficulty. He did not solve the complex problem, but he made a move towards the solution of it by writing under different pseudonyms. 'Florestan' was his more impulsive and 'Eusebius' his more reflective self, while 'Raro' was their judge and conciliator. It would really be a good thing for all critics to practise, for a time, some such outward projection of the different elements of their personalities. Criticism, in the last resort, is the attempt to induce others to see a thing as we see it. One important factor in the critic's equipment is the ability to place himself momentarily at other people's point of view,—to try to understand why they like what he dislikes, and vice versa. There is a Florestan and a Eusebius in each of us; the difficulty is to find our Raro; yet unless Raro has the last word, our criticism is not likely to command assent ten or twenty years hence. For the ages are the Raro to all of us; they score off, as it were, the extreme figures from all the contending opinions of one's own time, and find the true equation. The ideal critic would be he whose Raro alone spoke in public, after his Florestan and Eusebius had fully thrashed out their views before him in the quiet of his own chamber. When Schumann speaks in his own person, it is usually after some such internal hearing of both sides. Hence the general rightness of his judgments. One's first impression is that he was uncritically lenient towards work that we now see to have been of the second class. But if we read carefully his remarks upon people like Sterndale Bennett, for example, we see that, while kindly enthusiastic about the best elements in their work, he says against it practically all that can be said to-day. He never praises blindly, and rarely praises in excess, with the sole exception, perhaps, of Mendelssohn—which may probably be explained by personal affection and the closeness of association of the two men in Leipzig. Nothing indeed is more remarkable than the tact of his articles; only those who are daily engaged in the difficult business of criticism can appreciate the delicate art with which he blends enthusiasm and disagreement. His catholicity was as astounding as the quickness of his perceptions. Perhaps no other German of that day, with Schumann's temperament and in Schumann's surroundings, could have been so sympathetic towards Berlioz, and probably no other man could have seized so rapidly upon all that was good and all that was bad in Berlioz's art. There is little to-day to add to his summing up of the case. He was, indeed, singularly sure in his judgments of new art; he fastened at once, for example, upon the peculiar virtues of men so different from himself and from each other as Berlioz, Chopin and Franz. With all his admiration for the classical composers, he was perfectly flexible in his ideas of form, even seeing that Berlioz's forms were generally justifiable as the only possible outlet for his peculiarly individual ideas. He made one or two mistakes over the early Wagner, but soon corrected them. His almost infallible scent for the right thing was never more clearly shown than in the short 'Neue Bahnen' article that proclaimed the importance of the youthful Brahms. His judgments as a rule, indeed, were unusually sound. This gives his writings their greatest appeal to us to-day; in his own time they must have been extraordinarily rich in the power of kindling enthusiasm for whatever was good in art. For few critics have written so lovingly of lovable things; there is a pure ecstasy in his best talk about Schubert or Bach or Beethoven that thrills us even now, after the lapse of seventy or eighty years. Altogether his was a critical faculty of more than usual breadth, sanity, and fineness. He had, too, a decided literary gift; many of his phrases are unsurpassable for the swiftness and penetrating quality of their imagery — his comparison of Beethoven, for instance, to 'a crowned lion with a splinter in his paw.' The form and trappings of some of his articles, with their smack of Jean Paul and early Romanticism, are now a little antiquated; but in substance his critical work as a whole is as fresh to-day as when it was written. Of all the music-lovers who are celebrating the centenary of Schumann this month, it is the critics, perhaps, who should think most warmly of the master, for it was in his critical work that he had the greatest difficulties to face, and that he most unmistakably broke fresh ground.

ENGLISH FOLK-SONG AND ENGLISH MUSIC.

BY RUTLAND BUGHTON.

There is a certain type of musician who seems to think that the greatest musical art occupies its position by transcending nationalism. I believe the exact reverse to be the case. Any school of music must be national before it can be universal, even as a man must be well able to understand the doings of his own parish before he can realise the destinies of the country. The history of music affords abundant evidence of the national element which has gone to the making of the greatest composers. The Chorales out of which Bach's music grew as the branching beauty from a tree-trunk, were, in their origin, folk-songs. The themes of Haydn's symphonies are nearly always couched in the idiom of folk-music; and sometimes the master incorporated actual folk-tunes. So from national songs sprang the great line of symphonic composers; and even the greatest in the fullness of his power did not disdain to use simple unadorned folk-melody.* The idiomatic relationship between German folk-songs and the simpler melodies of Schubert is obvious. Weber's tunes are saturated with the folk-spirit, as has often been noted. Even Mendelssohn, cut off as he was (by reason of his race) from any intimate connection with folk-music, even he recognized the vital power of the national element: his 'Italian' and 'Scotch' Symphonies are the most notable instances of the fact. Wagner, who in musical style was a sort of continuation of Weber, proves his stock in his earlier tunes†: pieces like the Steersman's song, Senta's ballad, and the Shepherd's song in 'Tannhäuser,' offer true examples of that naïveté which is the outstanding force of folk-music. The compositions of Brahms and Tchaikovsky may almost be accepted as the apotheoses of Hungarian and Russian folk-song.

Now in England our musical technic has outrun the need for expression. Those men among us who are moved by the inborn necessity of their natures to express their feelings in musical terms, find at their disposal the colossal symphonic technic which the Germans have slowly developed through several generations. But that German technic has been evolved from the germ of German nationalism, and places the whole force of national expression behind the feelings of the composer, while the Englishman has little or none of that force at his command. The English composer has for so long a time been dependent upon foreign music that he is apt, not only to use its technic, but to echo its feeling as well.

Twenty years ago the very existence of English folk-music was doubted; and certainly there was little connection between that music and 'the art' as then cultivated. Even if the British composer felt within him the national mood he would not dream of associating it with his 'art.' That was why the genius of Sullivan was driven in another direction. Instead of expressing his Irish feelings with a modest and suitable technic, he was 'artistically' constrained to a German technic too ponderous for his delicate muse. His 'Irish' Symphony is a very attenuated Celt smothered in the ample folds of a German burgher's clothing. It would have seemed 'inartistic' to the musical conscience of the time to have ignored that foreign technic, and to have been content with less ambitious appearances more suited to an undeveloped national feeling. But on the other hand it is impossible to express a greater feeling than exists; and so Sullivan seems to have come to the conclusion that his powers were unequal to serious work.

And if the gulf between folk-music and art-music yawned wide for the Irish composer, how much worse was the position of the average English composer who was not even aware of the existence of his folk-music†! Luckily for us in these latter days, this gulf has at last been bridged. In Elgar the spirit of English folk-music has a very real life, and has been consistently developed by a technic suitable to it. I think the Englishness of his music is most clearly seen in 'Caractacus.' This, of course, is as it should be—must be in so true-hearted a composer. Much of the music is so closely akin to our folk-songs that we seem to breathe the very spirit of our quiet, tender country life (see pp. 19-20, 27 seq., especially the Druid maiden's song on pp. 33-4; 45 seq.; 71-72; 88 seq.; and many another page)—and it is just that quiet tenderness which is the salient feature of our folk-songs as distinct from our folk-dances. And the technic which Elgar has used to develop this specifically natural feeling has been the indigenous choral technic. He has done great work for us, not by expressing his personal feelings in all the glory of German methods, but by acting as a channel of national feeling, and conveying it by those choral means which come so naturally and joyfully to our lips. Is it a strange thing that music should be great when it has so great a force behind it, and so congenial a passage? Is it not common sense to sing in the vulgar tongue? For the assumption of universalism in music is as vain as universalism in language. A great poet does his best work in his own national tongue, and takes pride in an allusiveness which causes his readers to recognize his work as their very own—that is the method of Homer, Shakespeare, Whitman and the rest of them. It is the minor poet who disdains all reference to the village pump. So also in music: it is the little musician who strives for the far horizon of universalism. The great man feels (consciously or unconsciously) that his greatness derives from a spirit that lies deeper than his individuality, and he knows that only by getting into contact with that spirit can he do any good work. I am not inferring, and I do not believe, that a true school of British music will be built up by 'playing at folk-songs'—dressing them up as overtures, symphonies,§ and the like. But I do most earnestly believe that we can only get our great music by expressing and developing the same national emotional tendencies which, in primitive form, are found in folk-songs and folk-dances. And a large study of our folk-music will help towards this. Universal recognition will come afterwards to those who are great enough, as it has come to Elgar. But the joy and value of work does not lie chiefly in recognition.

† If we did not know of our own melody it is not surprising that the foreigner should be ignorant of it; and I once heard a Russian confidently declare that England would never produce a great composer because she had no folk-music of her own.

§ The symphonies may follow when, as in the cases of Brahms and Elgar, the emotional nature has been sufficiently developed to need the symphonic structure for its due exposition.

MUSICAL FORM.

BY E. HAROLD DAVIES.

'Moreover Form itself must drop into the background and become a hidden presence rather than an obvious and pressing feature.' (Sir Hubert Parry in Grave's Dictionary—Article on Form.)

There is, perhaps, nothing new to be said; it is only the old that needs to be newly said, for one is continually confronted by the spectacle of people quarrelling in wilful perversity over what is 'form' and what is not 'form,' when a realisation of the root of the matter would largely allay their differences.

Sometimes it would seem as if the whole casus belli between classicists and romanticists, between absolutists and programmatists, were this same question of form. It is at least one of the main points of contention, and the future of music is conceived as not more a matter of extended tonal and harmonic range, of rhythm or orchestral colour, than it is a matter of freer forms of expression. The ardent advocate of programme-music generally sees in his opponent a stickler for conventional classic forms, and especially for what is called 'sonata' form. The equally zealous admirer of the classic school (whatever that may be) can only discern in his foeman one who would relegate the art to a formless and chaotic state. Yet so great a programmatist as Richard Strauss assures us that in composing he has always musical form in view.

The misunderstanding surely lies in a wrong interpretation of form; in a too mechanical and inelastic view of its use. On the other hand, the remedy will be found in a firm grasp of essential principles, and, if necessary, a merciless scattering of inadequate rules, precedents and conventions. Principles are eternal; rules are often so undermined with exceptions that they must be forgotten almost as soon as they are learned.

What then is at the root of the question? That form is simply order, intelligibility, proportion, and nothing more. Chaos is confusing, destructive of reason; order is informing, and leaves an abiding mental image. These simple attributes of form are common to all the arts; but music has one distinctive peculiarity which is all its own. The art of painting, for example, is stationary, self-contained, an ever-present whole; while music is a ceaselessly-moving panorama, a succession of momentary impressions, each of which in turn displaces the last.

This distinction calls for special provision, hence the fundamental axiom that some kind of repetition is the inevitable basis on which form in music must rest. If there is to be any permanent impress upon the hearer's mind, if he is to carry away any ordered recollection of what he has listened to, it can only be secured by reverting, in some way or other, to the central interests of the work. And even apart from memory, this reversion is essential to the appreciation of organic unity. Do we not look at a picture in precisely this way? After first realising its most conspicuous features (principal subject), we next examine subordinate details (attendant and contrastive themes), and then as surely does our gaze revert to the main figures, but with now a fuller sense of the unity and proportion of the whole.

Granted then this principle of repetition as fundamental, the need for contrast, relief, must be enunciated as the second axiom. There is a dual necessity in this. By mere repetition, i.e., reiteration of the same thing, the brain is soon wearied, physically depleted; the power of thought and perception being alike destroyed. On this count alone, contrast is the imperative demand for recreation, mental restoration. But it is also the chief means of perception; we realise a thing almost wholly by virtue of comparison with its surroundings, and apart from this there can be no intelligent realisation. Furthermore, in the whole range of Art the degrees of contrast are also the degrees of expression.

On the other hand, contrast which is too violent, too sudden, provokes a sense of incongruity, sometimes of ludicrous inconsistency and in-harmony of style. To contrast therefore must be added the sense of proportion, the instinct for fitness, as ever-presiding arbiters over all forms.

With these two axioms in hand, plus the instinct for proportion, that which Sir Hubert Parry calls 'primary form,' i.e., statement, contrast, re-statement (A B A), would appear to be sufficient for all practical purposes. It embraces the whole psychology of musical structure; it is simple—as truth itself; elastic, capable of illimitable extension, the eternal parent of all succeeding varieties.

It would be difficult in this short space to show how the statement (A) might be simple or complex, of single or dual (binary) aspect; to show how the contrast (B) might be development or episode; to argue whether the re-statement (A) should be partial, complete, exact or varied; or, for that matter, how many re-statements, variants or contrasts there should be. Nor is it possible at this juncture to discuss the much-vexed question of key-relationship, that perpetually shifting ground—the very quicksand of perishing pedants.

Ceaseless growth is the order of evolution. Laws are few, but manifestations are countless; and in Art, as in Nature, the spheres of operation can never be compassed.

Then let the bounds of our art, both tonal and formal, be enlarged to the uttermost extent, so long as we retain and clearly discern, first, the principle of conservation, on which the human mind may rest; secondly, the principle of contrast, which is the sole light of perception; and lastly, the sense of proportion, which is the true source of artistic joy and ultimate perfection.

Surely all can agree here.

Mr. Herbert Whittaker, whose public reputation has been made chiefly by his achievements in connection with the Blackpool Glee and Madrigal Society, has been appointed conductor of the North Staffordshire and District Choral Society and of the Manchester Vocal Society. His friends will all wish him success in these responsible posts.

Occasional Notes.

Birmingham has happily solved one of its difficulties by appointing Mr. Henry J. Wood as conductor of the festival. Our national amour-propre is not so well flattered by the appointment of Herr Emil Mlynarski as conductor of the Choral and Orchestral Union concerts at Glasgow, although we recognise his abilities and wish him success. A third new appointment of significance is that of Mr. Albert Coates to the conductorship at the Imperial Opera House, St. Petersburg. Mr. Coates has been musically educated abroad, but his parentage is English. Although only twenty-eight years of age he has been conductor at Elberfeld, assistant to Schuch at Dresden, and principal conductor of the Mannheim Opera House. His career will be watched with interest.

Musical critics are like worms, they are very patient and long-suffering, and they can turn. Necessity recently compelled a group of unhappy scribes to attend a performance of 'La Sonnambula.' Below we quote their various forms of 'turning':

Rarely can an opera quite so supremely ridiculous as 'La Sonnambula' have been put upon the stage. The childishness of the plot, and the sheer inanity of the music combine, indeed, to give it a right to the title of the silliest opera in the world—and yet we tolerate it at the beginning of the twentieth century!—The Globe.

The revival of 'La Sonnambula' is also of purely personal significance. Nothing but the fiat of a prima donna would bring it into the repertory at this time of day. There is undoubted power in the closing scene, but one has to yawn through three acts of tedious action and melodious nothing to get to it.—The Observer.

The days are long past when the saccharine allurements of works like 'La Sonnambula' were supposed to endanger the success of works of greater dramatic force; and there is no longer any conceivable reason why they should not be given as long as there are sopranos with high E flats available, and opera-goers who like to renew the pleasures of their youth, or to realize what it was that charmed their grandparents.—The Times.

As one witnessed the performance of 'La Sonnambula' at Covent Garden last night, one could not help wondering whether, even in its palmist days, there was ever anyone who took the piece seriously.—The Daily Graphic.

Irreverent New Yorkers have the saying that 'in the midst of life we are in—Brooklyn.' In something of the same spirit one might observe that in the twentieth century one is still exposed to the risks of hearing 'La Sonnambula.' The faded old work was trotted out again yesterday for the benefit of Madame Tetrazzini and her admirers, and seemed, if possible, more faded and tawdry than ever. Bellini's work deals with the problem of a sleep-walker, but a still more serious one for most is the task of keeping awake while the work is being performed. There are surely few works whose soporific qualities are greater. As a cure for insomnia it should prove invaluable. What strikes one always about these old Italian works, which are supposed to be so full of melody, is their extraordinary poverty in this very particular. There are melodies of a kind, but they are all so tame and characterless that they go for little or nothing.—The Westminster Gazette.

Covent Garden looked more itself last night as far as the size of the audience was concerned, but besides the strangeness of so many black dresses there was a curious effect which was not at first to be analysed. It was simply that, although many of the women wore diamond necklaces, not one had a tiara. What is Covent Garden on a Tetrazzini or Melba night without tiaras? This may seem a trivial observation, but really a musical critic cannot be expected to listen seriously to Bellini's poor music. It is so dull, and there is really nothing for the soprano to sing until the last Act.—The Daily News.

Others bore their sufferings with greater patience. Their turn is to come.

A contemporary recently reviewed new editions of some of Wagner's operas, and quoted the remarks of an English critic made over half-a-century ago with reference to 'Tannhäuser' and 'Lohengrin,' to the effect that the public, in deference to their own ears, will not accept them. Our contemporary goes on to say, with truth, that the public had accepted them, and now popular editions of Wagner's operas are being issued. But popular editions of three of Wagner's operas have been on sale for many years. Novello & Co. issued 'Tannhäuser' and 'Lohengrin' in 1872, and 'The Flying Dutchman' in 1877, all with English translations.

At Halberstadt, near Magdeburg, on June 8, 10 and 12, three special performances of Wagner's 'Die Meistersinger' were given, with Herr van Rooy as Hans Sachs. For so small a town as Halberstadt (the population is only 46,000) this is in itself remarkable, but the second performance was given free of charge for the benefit of the poorer classes. On this occasion the audience was presented with a programme containing an explanation of Wagner's chef d'œuvre. The project was made possible largely through the generosity of a local music-lover, Geheimrath Dr. Kehr.

Ought there not to be a speed limit imposed upon pianolas as well as upon motor-cars? One of our contributors complains bitterly of the annoyance caused by his neighbours racing their instruments and playing Chopin's 'Funeral March' (the 'popular number' just now) like a schottische. Some people would say that this is a natural result of the speed at which we live, but we ourselves are more inclined to think it a natural part of the English character to treat music like Christopher Sly treated the play: 'Tis a very excellent piece of work, madam lady: would 'twere done!'.

Regarding motor-horns, now. There is going to be serious trouble if these develop any further. Notes high and low one can bear; trumpet and bassoon quality one submits to; even the imitation of a post-horn is no worse than the real thing. But now that they have invaded the domain of harmony and utilised triads, both consonant and dissonant, musicians may well take the alarm. Already we hear of one which plays the 'Hoyo-toho!' phrase from Wagner's 'Valkyrie,' and another which gives the opening of Beethoven's C minor Symphony. From these beginnings the appropriation of longer phrases is only a step, and we expect to hear shortly all the prominent themes, both melodic and harmonic, from the 'Nibelung's Ring.' Now mark our words! Should this come about, the downfall of Wagner (or any other composer so vulgarized) in public estimation will be swift and certain. How can one be thrilled by the opening of 'Tristan,' for instance, if its noble harmonies are associated with an evil-smelling machine impatient of control and alarming the pedestrian with its brazen voice? The foreign living composer will perhaps be protected by his Union, but the popular English musician—if there is one—will weakly say 'here is fame!' and then find his mistake too late. You smile. Very well; you will see!

Beethoven took interest in English politics, and in one of his letters, written in French, he mentions having read a notice of a work of his in the 'gazette anglaise nommée Morning cronicle.' Whether, however, he was a constant reader of English newspapers we cannot say. But of the gifted composer, Robert Schumann, the centenary of whose birth was celebrated last month, a letter has recently been published, and for the first time, in Die Musik. It was written in 1830 and addressed to Emilie, wife of his brother Julius. In it he says:—"The French is going on capitally. I read every day the Constitutionnel, and the Journal des Débats (also the English Times)." The Julius mentioned in the letter and his elder brother Eduard were inheritors of the book firm founded by their father.

To commemorate the hundredth anniversary of the Kaiserl. Königl. Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde in Vienna, which takes place in 1912, the Society has decided to offer a prize of 10,000 Kro. en (about £400) for a work for mixed chorus and orchestra (with or without solo voices). The poem on which the composition is founded must not have a political tendency. It may be written in any language, but if it is not in the German language a German translation must be provided. The competition is open to composers of all nationalities, but no composer may send in more than one work. It must be unpublished, and not previously performed in public. A copy of the score, not the original manuscript, should be sent. In forwarding MSS., the usual conditions should be observed—viz., the work should be provided with a motto or nom de plume, and accompanied by a sealed envelope with the motto or nom de plume written outside, and containing the name and address of the competitor. The compositions to be sent at composers' risk and expense. The last day for sending in works is May 1, 1912. The manuscript of the prize work becomes the property of the Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde and the Society has the right of first performance, which is to take place during the season of 1912-13, as well as of subsequent repetitions. Otherwise the work remains the composer's property. The following gentlemen have kindly consented to act as adjudicators in the competition—Dr. Karl Goldmark, composer (Vienna); Dr. Robert Hirschfeld, musical critic (Vienna); Geheimrath Dr. Hermann Kretschmar, Principal of the Königliche Hochschule (Berlin); Dr. Dan de Lange, Director of the Conservatoire (Amsterdam); Herr Ferdinand Löwe, Conductor (Vienna Concertverein); Herr Gustav Mahler, composer (Vienna); and Herr Franz Schalk, Conductor at the Imperial Opera (Vienna). On inquiry, the Directors of the Königl. Kaiserl. Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde in Vienna will forward, free of cost, any further information.

It will be seen from a statistical abstract recently issued by the Board of Trade, that our imports of musical instruments and accessories are declining in number and value. The following is the statement made:

The preliminary announcements of the programmes for the Gloucester musical festival, which will take place from September 6 to 9 inclusive, are as follows: Tuesday morning, Sullivan's 'In Memoriam' overture and 'Elijah'; evening, a new orchestral work specially written for the festival by Dr. Vaughan Williams and Elgar's 'Dream of Gerontius.' Wednesday morning, Sir Hubert Parry's 'Beyond these voices there is peace,' Elgar's Symphony, and a new work for Organ and Orchestra by Basil Harwood; also Brahms's Rhapsodie for alto solo and male voices, and Goetz's 'By the waters of Babylon'; evening (in the Shire Hall), Parry's 'Ode to music' and Dr. Herbert Brewer's new Suite for chorus and orchestra, 'Summer sports,' composed for the festival. Thursday morning, Richard Strauss's 'Tod und Verklärung' and Verdi's 'Requiem,' Beethoven's 'Eroica' Symphony, and C. H. Lloyd's motet 'The righteous live for evermore'; evening, a new choral work by Granville Bantock and the 'Hymn of Praise.' Friday morning, the 'Messiah.' The usual opening service will take place in the Cathedral on Sunday, September 4. Sir Edward Elgar, Sir Hubert Parry, Dr. Vaughan Williams, Dr. Harwood, Dr. Brewer, Dr. Lloyd and Mr. Granville Bantock will conduct their own compositions, and Dr. A. Herbert Brewer will, as usual, be the conductor-in-chief of the festival.

Some of the musical instruments which belonged to great composers have been preserved, and among them are prominent: Handel's double-harpsichord, now in the Victoria and Albert Museum; Beethoven's pianoforte presented to him by Mr. Thomas Broadwood; and the spinet and 'grand' pianoforte on which Mozart and his sister Nannerl used to play. On the other hand, of valuable instruments which belonged to Bach, there is, however, no trace. And what indeed became of the organ, the double spinet, the single spinet, which 'according to her husband's desire, Purcell's widow gave to her son Edward?

An article entitled 'L'Alto de Mozart,' recently published in Le Guide Musical, gives an interesting account of an instrument which once belonged to Mozart. As a boy he played the violin, but in 1777 his father, in a letter, expressed a fear that he was neglecting his practice. Mozart, in fact, in later years preferred the viola. In 1785, when his father visited Vienna, we read of the last three of the six quartets dedicated to Haydn being tried over at Mozart's house, Haydn himself being leader, Dittersdorf and Vanhall second violin and violoncello, respectively, while Mozart played the viola. The 'alto' (or tenor as it is named in England) mentioned in the Guide Musical article, was probably the very one on which the composer played at the performance just mentioned. After his death it became the property of Dr. Zizius, Professor at the Vienna University, and when he died in 1826 it was sold to Professor Leopold Jansa, a member of the Imperial Chapel at Vienna. Lord Wentworth, who afterwards became Count Lovelace, was a pupil and friend of this distinguished composer, and he bought it in 1875 from Jansa's widow. Finally it was acquired last year from the Countess Lovelace by Mr. Edward Speyer, the writer of the article mentioned, and in it he gives documentary evidence which leaves no doubt as to the instrument having belonged to the persons mentioned. On the label inside is the following:

Giouani Paulo Megni
A Brescia. 1615.

Why does disaster so constantly attend on novelists who venture to introduce musical topics? Here is Miss Marjorie Bowen, whose 'Viper of Milan' and more recent work, 'I will maintain,' show a familiarity with the periods described which is little short of wonderful in so young a writer, but who is no more able than the rest to avoid misfortune when she somewhat needlessly introduces musical details. In her recent book the hero, William of Orange—our William III.—is represented as attending a ball in the Binnenhof at the Hague, his age at the time being given as seventeen. As he was born in 1650, this brings us to the year 1667. During the evening 'the violins struck up the Sarabande from Campia's "Tancredi."' Campia is no doubt intended, and the error in the name is simply a misprint which may be forgiven, but Campia was born in 1660, and was therefore only seven years old at that time, and moreover 'Tancredi,' as a matter of fact, was not produced till 1702—i.e., thirty-five years later, which was actually the date of William's death. A few pages further we read: 'the next dance was a minuet by Sully . . . called "Le Temple de la Paix."' Sully should of course be Lully, and is another case of careless proof-reading; but here again Miss Bowen is out of her reckoning by eighteen years, for the work in question did not appear till 1685. It is no shame, even to a well-read musician, to have no acquaintance with the works of Campia, but having resolved by some mysterious principle of selection to bring in his name, it is curious that the author should not have consulted one of the many available works of reference, and thus avoided error.

A portrait of Schumann was given in our issue for November, 1905, in connection with an article on the composer's music in England which appeared in that number.

THE VEIL.

DR. COWEN'S NEW CHORAL WORK FOR THE CARDIFF FESTIVAL, SEPTEMBER, 1910.

It will be matter of interest to the promoters of musical festivals and the leading choral societies throughout the Empire to know that Dr. Cowen has completed a choral work of great importance and scope.

The former essays of the composer in this form of composition, amongst which may be mentioned 'The Rose Maiden' (1870, when he was eighteen years of age), 'The Sleeping Beauty,' 'The Water Lily' and 'St. John's eve,' have all enjoyed vogue, and have exhibited his flow of melody and welcome lucidity. It is generally agreed that his somewhat neglected setting of Collins's 'Ode to the passions,' which was produced at the Leeds festival in 1898, revealed a great development of his talent. But unless we are much mistaken his new work will be pronounced to excel all his previous achievements. The idiom in which it is cast in order to express the mysticism and sublimity of the poem, is one not previously employed by the composer. But it seems natural enough.

The new work is a setting of portions of Robert Buchanan's profound and powerful poem, entitled 'The Book of Orm,' which was published in 1870. In view of the difficulty of finding subjects of sufficient breadth and intensity for choral treatment, it is not a little remarkable that this deeply significant poem with its magnificent and thrilling diction has escaped attention for so long.

The 'Book of Orm' is in brief an apologia for or a vindication of the ways of God to men. Its scope is indicated by the mottoes fixed by Buchanan at the head of his book. They are as follows:

This also we humbly beg,—that Human things may not prejudice such as are Divine, neither that from the unlocking of the Gates of Sense, and the kindling of a greater Natural Light, anything of incredulity or intellectual might may arise in our minds towards DIVINE MYSTERIES.—'Students' Prayer,' Bacon.

To vindicate the ways of God to man.—Milton.

God's Mystery will I vindicate, the Mystery of the Veil and of the Shadow; yea, also Death and Sorrow, God's divine Angels on all earths; and I will vindicate the Soul, that the Soul may vindicate the Flesh; and all these things shall vindicate Evil, proving God's mercy to His creatures, great and small.—A rune found in the starlight.

The poem is in eight sections, but only portions of seven are drawn upon by the composer. The prelude is entitled 'The book of visions seen by Orm the Celt,' and contains the lines:

O brother, hold me by the hand, and hearken,
For these things I shall phrase are thine and mine,
And all men's—all are seeking for a sign.

These words are sung by the solo baritone as an introduction to Part I. They are preceded by a striking chordal theme, which is used and developed significantly:

Molto lento. $\text{♩} = 50$.
bis.

No. 1.

Part I. (The Veil woven) which has for its text the following lines

*How God in the beginning drew
Over His face the Veil of blue,
Wherefore no soul of mortal race
Hath ever look'd upon the Face.*

commences with a chorus to the words

In the beginning,
Ere man grew,
The Veil was woven
Bright and blue;

which is introduced by these mysterious chords:

Molto Andante e sostenuto. $\text{♩} = 58$.

No. 2.

Later the following theme occurs :

A powerful climax is made at the words :

Evermore hoping,
 Evermore seeking,
 Nevermore guessing
 The Master so near.

An Evangel, 'whom God loved deep,' touched at the grief of mortals, groping, weeping, and 'blundering onward from race to race,' asks: 'Were it not better, once and for ever, to unveil the Face?' This (a tenor solo) is introduced by the following passage :

God answers: 'Not yet! Much is to remember, Much to forget,' and a short tranquil chorus to the words :

And, with eyes tear-clouded
 He gazed through the luminous
 Star in-wrought, beautiful,
 Folds of the Veil.

ends the first section of Part I.

The second section, entitled 'Earth the mother,' has an instrumental introduction which begins thus :

and the words for some time are given to a soprano soloist, and afterwards the chorus, as Mankind, the children of the Mother Earth, cry out to the empty air :

Father of mortals,
 Art Thou there?

This despairing appeal is answered from the thunder-cloud in a choral climax of great intensity :

I am God the Maker!
 I am God the Master!
 I am God the Father!

But although the Master 'made sign on sign,' the people heard not, the people saw not :

Earth and her children
 Were deaf and blind.
 While, over them, dreaming,
 Deepen'd the luminous
 Star in-wrought, beautiful
 Folds of the wondrous Veil.

With this impressive passage the First Part ends.

Part II. is entitled 'The Dream of the World without Death,' and has for its motto the following words :

*Songs of corruption, woven thus,
 With tender thoughts and tremulous,
 Sitting with a solemn face
 In an island burying-place,
 While weary waves broke sad and slow
 O'er weedy wastes of sand below,
 And stretch'd on every side of me
 The rainy grief of the gray sea.*

The music here becomes of deep interest. The Watcher at the Deathbed (baritone solo) sings quasi recit. a Phantasy, and then falls into a dream—'the Dream of the World without Death.' This is associated with a tremolo theme :

and later by another significant phrase :

A Maestoso choral section, introduced by a striking ascending passage :

culminates in a thrilling climax. The words are

The Master on His throne
 Openeth now the seventh seal of wonder,
 And beckoneth back the angel men name Death.

The vision continues, still allied to a choral setting ; the dreamer recounts the effect of the imagined decree on Mankind :

And the world shrieked, and the summer time was bitter,
 And men and women feared the air behind them ;
 And for lack of its green graves the world was hateful.

No comfort in the slow farewell,
 Nor gentle shutting of beloved eyes ;
 There were no sweet green graves to sit and muse on,
 Till grief should grow a summer meditation, . . .
 Nothing but sudden parting—and a blankness.

A mother (contralto) bewails the sudden snatching of her little ones. Her deeply emotional music is introduced by a theme of much charm :

She exclaims that their mouths

Blow rosebuds to the rosebuds, and their eyes
Looked violets at the violets, and their hair
Made sunshine in the sunshine, and their passing
Left a pleasure in the dewy leaves behind them ;
And suddenly my little son looked upward,
And his eyes were dried like dewdrops ; and his going
Was like a blow of fire upon my face.

A few solemn chords precede the poignant utterance

And my little son was gone.

The Watcher awakes, and realises that he has but dreamed. He cries :

O unseen Sender of Corruption,
I bless Thee for the wonder of Thy mercy,
Which softenth the mystery and the parting.

This streams into a choral refrain to the same words, and the first section of Part II. comes to an imposing conclusion.

(To be continued.)

THE FUNCTION OF ART.

BY FREDERICK CHARLES BAKER.

The function of Art lies in its adaptability to suggest the spiritual and the ideal. Unless the salient principal quality of an art-product exhibits a clear æsthetic ideal, its claim to be designated as a work of art cannot be justified. Therefore, when in painting, music, or sculpture, we gain nothing but amusement or pleasing sensations, we may definitely conclude that we are not in the environment of Art at all. The essential character of Art—as in painting, for instance—is first to eliminate the crude and ugly, and secondly to aggrandize all component parts of beauty, and present them in such a manner as to suggest some synthetical ideal, so that we may learn to perceive not only the beauty of holiness but also the holiness of beauty.

Ideals may be suggested to us either by beauty of form, colour, or sound. If by beauty of sound, then it is by means of music, which proves that its special function is not merely to charm the auditory nerve, but to enhance the elements of our finer nature and elevate our minds with noble ideas. In other words, it is the mission of music to supply our consciousness with mystic presentations, so that our cerebral activity abounds in rich and beautiful thoughts which will predominate over our animal tendencies and leave our volitional powers more firm to 'eschew evil and do good.' It is this attribute of a composition, or the want of it, that determines whether such a composition shall stand as a work of Art or not. No amount of contrapuntal ingenuity or polyphonic complexity can compensate for the lack of essence of character in a composition. Hence for this reason there is such a thing as right and wrong in the morale of music, so that it is essential to have it classified in order that the inexperienced, when asking for bread, shall not be given a stone.

When music has nothing for its recommendation but rhythm and an inane melody, it is of little use for enhancing our finer feelings, for such music as this acts mainly upon the motor and sensory nerves only, and may be said to truly serve the flesh more than the spirit. Rhythm, although an essential element of music, must not be the summum bonum of its character, for rhythm at most can only appeal to our emotional faculties, as it does even to animals. Evidence to prove this dictum abounds in the form of so-called dance music, where the rhythm is very marked and conspicuous by its preponderance. Music of this class affects our heart pulsations so that we feel light-hearted and excitable, but from such music we do not gain noble thoughts nor the inclination to aspire to better things, for the simple reason that such music does not embody a noble thought or representative idea. Hence it is impossible to assign to this species of music any art-form that can be worthily called Art.

What is known as sentimental music also lacks the essential qualities of Art for similar reasons. Music of this type obtains sympathy with our nerves of sensibility, and thereby affects our sentiments to such a degree that our emotions degenerate into mere sentimentality. Sentimentality is so injurious to our strength of character that great care must be taken not to encourage it—that is, if we would avoid having a weak, maudlin, and ignoble temperament, rather than one which is strong, royal, and self-contained. If music is to be considered as the exponent of the moral ideal as well as the æsthetic ideal, it must suggest something more than mere sentimentality, or its asset to a nation will be in strict conflict with the object of Art altogether, for it would tend to encourage a nation of effeminate and hysterical erotomaniacs rather than a nation of sane, healthy, level-headed men, and the function of Art, rather than suggesting the spiritual and ideal, would find its rôle as the handmaid of degeneration.

Hence it is only that which is known as 'classical music' that can claim consideration in the function of Art. This kind of music acts not only on the motor and sensory nerves, but simultaneously on the intelligence as well, and is conspicuous by its very character—it allows sensuousness, but never sensuality; intellectuality, but not pedantry; sentiment, but not sentimentality. Its function, therefore, is obvious, for it must tend to strengthen our weakness, sober our lives, and so help us to cultivate what Tennyson so well expresses as 'self-reverence, self-knowledge and self-control.' Through the media of melody and harmony the composer expresses his ideas, and by his consummate art excites our sense of beauty, so that we gain from his composition some spiritual significance or moral ideals.

'Fine Art,' says Ruskin, 'is that in which the hand, the heart, and the head go together. Greatness of Art consists first in earnest and intense seizing of natural facts; then the ordering these facts by strength of human intellect, so as to make them for all who look upon them to the utmost serviceable, memorable and beautiful. And thus great Art is nothing else than the type of a strong and noble life.' Real Art, then, whether as classical music, painting, or sculpture, reveals beauty, not only as a phenomenal substance but as a spirit, for in the finite we behold the Infinite, and in the visible the Invisible. If the plastic arts can suggest beauty through concrete forms, music can suggest, by its subtle allusiveness, many inexpressible and transcendental ideals, and for this reason a place is assigned to it in our forms of public worship, because of its efficacy in quickening the pneuma, or God-consciousness within us. 'It is,' as Plato says, 'the essence of order, and leads to all that is good, just, and beautiful, of which it is the invisible, but nevertheless dazzling, passionate and eternal form.' In other words, 'it is,' as Carlyle says, 'a kind of inarticulate, unfathomable speech, which leads us to the edge of the infinite and lets us for moments gaze into it.'

This beauty in form, order and proportion, whether conveyed to us through sculpture, music, or painting, is intended to arouse in us that admiration for 'whatsoever things are lovely and whatsoever things are pure,' and this—and this alone—is the function of Art. Founded on the laws of order itself, Art collects beauty in form and proportion, and under different arrangements presents to our senses some essential character, and consequently some leading idea—according to the artist's conception—so that through this vision we see the world as it really is—full of grandeur, flooded with beauty, and pervaded with mystery—a mystery which is the manifestation of that Sublime Presence, the presence of the Eternal and the Infinite.

THE ART OF THE ORGAN PROGRAMME.

BY SYDNEY GREW.

I.

Some few months ago I had the privilege of publishing* an article on 'The organ as a solo instrument.' In the course of my remarks I spoke of the inartistic nature (as judged by ordinary canons) of the average organ-recital programme, and drew attention to the fact that this was one of the reasons why the organ recital failed to attract musicians in general. This is a point of so much importance as to call for further and separate consideration. The whole question of real art in the organ programme, as elsewhere, lies in a certain unity—a unity that serves to knit everything into a cohesive totality. This is one of the main principles that hall-mark the artist; yet it is the one most flagrantly ignored by the organist. But for a certain circumstance to be noted later, this would induce one to affirm that the organist is fundamentally inartistic. Such a statement, indeed, is not infrequently made; and, granting the truth of the theory that a man's artistic nature (or his lack of it) is shown most clearly and conclusively in his drawing up of a programme, it is hard to controvert it. We only need to glance at the published particulars of organ concerts to see how far this form of musical performance falls away from the right path. The main characteristics of a satisfactory programme are obvious, but they are broken by organists on every hand. Organists recognise that variety is necessary, for without variety there comes monotony, least artistic of things; but these musicians forget that changes must only be partial, that they should never deviate into violent contrast. The degree of contrast needed is similar to that found in paintings: here one figure is placed in opposition to another in order to give it greater effect, and in music one piece is set in opposition to another in order to enhance its beauty and impressiveness. If the contrast of the two pieces is so great as to obliterate the effect of the first, a most serious artistic blunder is made, and a step taken backwards instead of forwards. I shall refer to this point, using actual published examples, in the second part of this article; but here I may add the remark that there is altogether too much unsteadiness of emotional force in the average organ programme, with the inevitable consequence that the chief value of the thing becomes of none effect.

A unity of aim and of idea should run through the whole list of pieces, marshalling means to an end. In musical art the biggest and the smallest things are governed by the same primary laws; there is a climax in both the hymn-tune and in the symphony, and everything is designed to work towards the point aimed for. In the organ recital this point is the providing of a succession of musical emotions; and so the thing to be avoided as the plague is the conveying of a hotch-potch of contradictory impressions out of which nothing of permanent value can possibly arise. It is a melancholy fact, however, that instinctive principles of this kind are often broken, not only by organists, but also by other more favourably situated musicians. A perfectly satisfactory programme can perhaps be offered only by an artist working alone, or at the most by two working together. In the case of a 'miscellaneous' concert it is entirely out of the question except when some guiding spirit exercises supreme authority; and in the case of the 'star' concert it is ever harder of attainment, for when a great artist is accompanied by a number of smaller personalities the work of the latter is scarcely regarded as serious, and artistic unity is not to be expected among stop-gaps and sandwiches. Things are different in the orchestral concert; and the organist, the vocalist and the pianist can also achieve perfection in the same way.

But it is clear that of all musical functions that remain in one pair of hands the organ recital is the worst in this respect. It almost seems that no sense of the deep, inner nature of music has been vouchsafed the average organ player, he shows so much insensitiveness to the interrelationship of pieces. No art in performance can make a string of compositions satisfactory if their order is so clumsy as to cause a jar even in the reading; and one feels almost as much pain—though not so much excitement—in reading a list of organ recital programmes as in reading a month's record of crimes. The critical observer can very accurately appraise the value of an artist by studying the order of his programmes, since no high-souled, thoughtful artist makes many errors in this direction, proof of this theory lying in what is to be seen of the work of performers like Richter, Elena Gerhardt and Leonard Borwick. There is only one thing that seems to explain the general inability of the organist to read in his music its underlying emotional idea, and in it we perhaps see the cause of this serious failing.

I refer to the widespread habit of organists of neglecting the higher branches of their art for the shallower details of displaying their own agility and the variety and resources of their wonderful instrument. The first fault is one common to all types of virtuoso performer, and does not call for discussion here; the second is probably due to the impersonal nature of the organ. Because of this the player is never much in evidence, and people in general are attracted by the instrument more than by the man. One notices after an organ concert that the comments are made on the beauty of the solo stops, the effectiveness of the swell, and the grandeur and dignity of the full organ; not of the interpretative gifts of the recitalist and of the characteristics of his readings. This being the case, the human weakness of the organist rather induces him to pander to it, out of which come all the faults of excessive and constant change of registration and so forth. This has developed until one sometimes wonders if there is not some vague disgrace attending upon anything different. It is shown up most strongly in such cases as when some dainty morceau has been encoired, and the player repeats it with total change of solo stop and of accompanying tone-colour. But the habit is far more deeply-rooted than this, and gives rise to such injunctions as I myself once received from my professor, which was to try never to play the same composition twice alike in the matter of stop combination. Organists make the great error of blindly bowing to such vague traditions; and, confused or attracted by the multiplicity of means at their disposal, they end in developing artistic deficiencies of the order to be spoken of in the present article.

* In the London Musical Opinion for July, 1909.

II.

One may look for a long while before finding evidence of some true guiding principle in organ programmes. The only near approach to such that is at all common is the old plan of preserving a sequence of keys (as in the changes of chants in long psalms), or of alternating loud pieces with soft and 'solo' compositions with music of fuller character. But there is no deep thought here; and so we find a work like Lemare's pleasant little Andantino in D flat placed immediately after a Bach fugue or a Rheinberger sonata movement, for all the world as though the player had to rush in with light refreshments to sustain the weary listener. At the moment of writing I have to hand the April issue of the New Music Review, which contains an unusually full list of organ recital programmes. The clashing of mood that almost always accompanies the Bach examples is curious. One player gives his audience a Communion by Batiste after the tremendous Passacaglia and Fugue in C minor; another, after the absorbing Prelude and Fugue in A minor, plays Dudley Buck's 'Sunshine and shadow'; another considers Lemare's Romance in D flat and the Toccata in F as good companion pieces, fit to stand side by side in a programme; a fourth couples the genius of Bach (as shown in the Toccata and Fugue in D minor) with the pretty talent of Cécile Chaminade, and a fifth follows the same work with Lemare's slight Berceuse in D. It is not easy to understand this insensibility to true musical effects. The musician who has received any measure of the spirit of Bach is in very exalted mood, and no more wants trifling melodies in sequence than he would want (under other circumstances) the 'Bee's wedding' to follow the C minor Symphony. If the organist or his audience want such a change there is something wrong in the air, and it would be well to leave Bach alone; for half-hearted efforts only count as so much time and labour wasted.

While speaking of Bach, I may conveniently draw attention to another detail in the usual treatment of this composer that argues the failure of organists to get into the meaning of the music they play. It is a favourite plan to open fire with a Bach fugue. This, judging by the context, is somewhat akin to the custom adopted by people who want to stand well with the powers-that-be, of taking a dose of medicine immediately before a contemplated orgie: both organist and organist act thus more in the spirit of faith than of understanding. But however reliable this course may be in physical matters, it results, in artistic matters, in a serious falling away from common-sense. What is wanted at the beginning of a programme is certainly something of the highest possible order—something that may act as a base, as a foundation of true musical beauty, to bear the superstructure of varied effects and sensations that is to be erected in the course of the evening. The mood of an audience is a ticklish thing to negotiate, and one detail of the art of the programme is to induce at the outset an absorption of the musical sense. This can only be effected by high and lofty music; but that does not mean that the most abstruse or complicated work should be offered first. The ground must be tilled before the seed is cast, and the average listener is not ordinarily in the right mood at once for the intense strain of Bach or for even the elevated sentiment of Rheinberger. What is necessary here is to give something that satisfies the artistic hunger of the musician; after which sympathy and indulgence can more safely be counted on and quicker understanding of heavy music be assured.

III.

This kind of destructive criticism could be continued indefinitely; but a few further remarks on actual programmes may be submitted, in order to give point to the preceding arguments, before proceeding differently.

In one of the programmes reported in the above-mentioned issue of The New Music Review, we find the organist moving from the Handel-like Grand Chœur in D of Guilman to the 'Messiah' overture. This is a good sequence; and the two pieces, aided particularly by the well-remembered strains of the latter, would induce a mood of most elevated character. But where are we taken to next? Into the midst of the noise and bustle, of the boom and clang and crash of one of Elgar's 'Pomp and Circumstance' military marches. The calmness and dignity of the earlier pieces is knocked out by strenuous energy and modern excitement. The fourth item, unknown to the present writer (a Toccata in E minor by Homer N. Bartlett), is probably a normal organ composition, neither original nor strikingly characteristic; as such it would lead to a formal organ mood, out of keeping with the Elgar but likely to revert to the Handel. We are next, however, conveyed into the domain of the early Wagner, and surrounded by a vividly reminiscent theatrical mood, the piece being the Introduction to the third act of 'Lohengrin.' This is followed by the last item of the recital, the March from 'Aida.' Thus the organist shows throughout his selection no sense of artistic contrast or of continuity. The most culpable progression is from the second to the third numbers: after the Handel there is little pleasure in contemplating anything of less strength and beauty than (to mention four very widely separated but none the less appropriate works) the 'St. Anne' Prelude of Bach, the E flat minor Sonata of Rheinberger, the F minor Sonata of Mendelssohn, or the 'Concertsatz' in E flat minor of Merkel. There may be a probability that such music as this was too big for the special occasion; but there are scores of things, both original and transcribed, that would have followed the first two pieces and still have led gradually into the last two.

In another programme are to be seen as the first three items Schubert's 'Ave Maria,' Lemare's 'Gavotte Moderne' and the 'Chorus of Pilgrims' from 'Tannhäuser.' There is something brutal in this arrangement. There is, first, the exquisite song, full of pathos and extreme tender pleading; then the little 'Gavotte,' admittedly light of feeling; then an absurd transition to the broad and noble Wagner. The first step is painful, the second ludicrous; and the unfortunately sensitive listener feels himself knocked about like pins in a skittle-alley. A vocalist or a pianist who did such a thing would be laughed from the platform; but the organist seems to consider it perfectly normal and praiseworthy, and his audience to find no cause of complaint in it.

There is, in the musical newspaper from which I am quoting, an example of that class of organ recital that lowers the instrument to the level of the circus orchestra, by vulgar ear-tickling and by such external devices as lowering the lights of the auditorium and gradually raising them again in order to assist the illusion aimed at in the music of nightfall and dawn.

This is a phase of organ work that cannot be discussed here, although it and the wretched crew who adopt it await the severest condemnation. It is, however, to the present point to note that the organist here plunges from the high-souled 'Finlandia' of Sibelius to the obvious sentiment of the 'Romance' in D flat of Lemare, and from the conventionally vapid 'Forget-me-not' Intermezzo of Macbeth to the dazzling brilliancy of the great Fugue in D major—the latter, of course, minus its essential Prelude.

All these American recital lists, however, are not bad. There is a fine example of the short programme in one that opens with Mendelssohn's Sonata in A, moves from this to the Prelude, Fugue, and Variation in B minor of César Franck, and, after two light and restful pieces (Chauver's Andantino 'Les Cloches' and Rheinberger's 'Visione' in D flat), concludes with the powerful Toccata and Fugue in D minor. There is something closely akin to selective genius here. One notices in particular how the imperious call of the opening of the Bach arouses the listener from the quiescence of the 'Visione,' and leads him rapidly back to the noble mood of strength, energy, and vigour of the opening pieces. Another programme that hangs well together is one that opens with the Prelude and Fugue in D minor of Bach, moves through an Aria of the same composer to a Passacaglia by the recitalist, follows this with a fine Widor movement and a Liszt fugue, and concludes with three short and well-contrasted compositions.

IV.

It is not possible to suggest here what seems a perfect programme for the organ concert. The musician does not arrange his pieces in the abstract; he generally knows his audience, or his type of audience, and his artistic sensibility (far more than his experience) shows him what order of effects is most suitable for the occasion. In the same way the artistic sensibility of the critic will keep him from the wrong mood, and will thus fit him to discuss the work of the recitalist; for when one approaches a concert in the right spirit (as the critic always does, be he a true critic), one generally finds the right mood self-created. It is this detail of the musical temperament that the organist has developed to a remarkable degree—so far, that is, as his church work goes. He seems at once to feel the varying atmosphere of the changing seasons and offices, and to convey his sense of them to his congregation. I made allusion to this at the commencement of my essay, affirming it to be the one thing that proved the primary artistic nature of the organist. It induces faith in the future development of the organ concert, for the organist should have little difficulty in fully carrying it outside his church work into the secular field. He has his music fixed for him here, and it would not really be easy to disturb the unity of the occasion; and if he but tries to see the similar definiteness of mood that lies in the best class of organ music, he will find the same success equally easy of attainment in his concerts.

I have already spoken of the opening numbers of the recital programme. Breadth and massiveness, and a noble sentiment, however indefinite, should characterize them. It is not here that the pretty ideas of the French school of writers are of best effect; the place for such is elsewhere in the programme: nor the complexity and extent of the larger kinds of music. If the recitalist feels called upon to offer an extemporaneous item, the best place is obviously at the beginning; for if he were a sensitive artist, he would already be filled with the mood of his programme, and by this means would almost unconsciously carry his listeners along with him into the midst of that mood. As soon as everything is prepared, and the audience lifted high into those calm regions so typical of the organ, the noblest sentiment of the hour can be offered; and given adequate performance on the emotional as well as on the technical side, it will not often fall upon stony ground, particularly if judicious notes have informed the people beforehand of what is coming. After this, some slight variety is necessary. If an interval can be given, it is very welcome to the musician who has been drawn out by Bach or Rheinberger or Wagner; but if this is inadvisable, the interpolated item, be it song or solo, quartet or massed choral singing, must be of the highest possible order. There can then come, in the second half of the programme, music of the most diverse order: little-known works of the great organ composers, brilliant show pieces, orchestral transcriptions, fanciful groups of small pieces, and the many novelties lying to hand in all directions. Such an order would incline the cultured musician to favour curious explorations and would also entrap the most bigoted purist into countenancing transcriptions. It obviously makes the circumstances more fit than the ordinary programme arrangement does for works of small genre. Environment is everything: a daisy would look unhappy in a hot-house and a lake rather insignificant by the side of the sea; and so a dainty fancy should not be rammed among colossal monuments of the art of the organ composer.

To sum up, unity of progress must mark the programme of the organ concert, the succession of pieces resulting in a piling up of emotional experiences that (if they are cunningly arranged) will end in some permanent good for the impressionable listener. Sensation must melt into sensation, the effect of one moment being enhanced or relieved by the next, until the final climax is won. The organist who follows this plan, remembering that the principle that knits together 'Gerontius' or 'Tristan' can operate in the same way in a modest concert programme, will prove his personal musicianship, will win the sympathy of the most artistic and also of the most inartistic of audiences, and will modernize a valuable but as yet contemptuously regarded branch of musical activity.

Church and Organ Music.

Mr. J. A. Fuller Maitland, in addressing the Church Music Society, made some drastic remarks on the subject of Church music and the need for its reform, with which we heartily agree. He puts the case concisely when he says: 'The objection, when we may be pleading for a little good music is, "You must remember that we have to consult all tastes, and that the church is not a concert-room." If all tastes were really consulted there would be nothing to say against this remark, but it generally happens that those who make it are careful to consult only one taste, their own and that of the domestic servant. Let the kitchenmaid wallow in the most sentimental effusions of Moody and Sankey or the warlike strains of the Salvation Army, but let provision also be made for people whose education prevents them from enjoying these methods of exciting religious fervour.' Why not at once bring the surroundings into line with the music which we too often hear! Let us destroy the groined roof, replacing it by a rough beam or two—anything will do. Then, instead of stained glass, let us have plain; let us cover the mosaics with whitewash or some modern washable paint. Then any organ will do, so long as it makes enough noise. The words and tunes of many of the hymns will do well as they are, and require no alteration.

No, the point lost sight of by so many is that our church music must be pure in origin and workmanship, and this does not always mean that it must be ancient. We have much of later development which is uplifting, and the sooner people will humble themselves and submit to musical education, so soon will our church services fulfil their high mission. Let us worship by the intellect rather than by the emotions. There is an intellectual emotion, the memory of which will not fade. Pandering to the lower tastes of the uneducated will never raise them, and it is to be regretted that, as Mr. Fuller Maitland rightly says, so many of those who have the power, use it to gratify their own taste, which is on this low level. That 'bright, cheery, hearty service,' of which he speaks, means pain to many, and the fear of the 'concert-room' is too often the lame excuse offered. We assert boldly that many a concert leaves a better and higher impression on the mind than can these 'hearty' services, well-meant, misguided, though they often are.

SPECIAL SERVICES.

JERSEY CHURCH CHOIRS FESTIVAL.

The third annual festival of the Association of Church Choirs for the Deanery of Jersey took place on June 2 in St. Mark's Church. Eighteen choirs from the town of St. Heliers and the rural parishes attended, comprising about 400 voices. The church was crowded. The preacher was the Dean of Jersey. The service was intoned by the curate-in-charge of St. Mark's Church (Rev. J. Moor) and the rector of St. Clement (Rev. C. W. Balleine). Mr. C. E. Stevens, organist of St. Mark's Church, ably presided at the organ, and Mr. J. Hubert, conductor to the Association, conducted. The festival service, at 7.30 p.m., opened with the singing of the processional hymn 'Forward! be our watchword' to an inspiring tune by Henry Smart. Among the features of the service were the Magnificat and Nunc dimittis to Sir John Goss's setting in A, Bruce Steane's anthem 'The Lord is my strength,' and the recessional hymn 'There is an ancient river' to the grand tune 'Cephas,' written by Sir George Martin. The service fitly closed with the singing of a Threefold Amen composed by J. H. Maunders.

The fortieth Anniversary Festival of the London Gregorian Association was held on Thursday, June 9, in St. Paul's Cathedral, and those responsible may be congratulated upon the musical result attained. Mr. Francis Burgess (the hon. musical director) conducted with care and judgment, while Mr. Edgar T. Cook, of Southwark Cathedral (hon. organist), played the organ most skilfully. The experiment of dividing these offices proved very successful, one effect being a better ensemble. The processional hymns were sung to tunes by M. Greiter (c. 1525) and R. Heider (c. 1648). Mode II. Sarum was used for the office hymn. Other examples were: Mode IV., Sarum and 'Regnata orbis,' Mode VI., La Feillée, and the chorale 'Nun Freut euch.' The Psalms were sung to Tones VII., 2, Sarum; VIII., 2, Sarum, and I., 4, Sarum; those used for the Canticles being I., g, Solesmes, and III., 4, Sarum respectively. The anthem was 'O Lord of hosts,' by Tye. The large choir, numbering some hundreds, gave evidence of skilful training.

Bristol Cathedral was, on June 15, the scene of a most successful Diocesan Choral Festival, being the first of a series of such services organized by the committee of the Bristol Diocesan Choral Union. The choir numbered 350 voices, drawn mostly from the city deanery, including the cathedral choir, those of All Saints', St. Clement's, All Saints' (Clifton), and many others. The introductory voluntaries were played by Mr. W. E. Fowler (organist of All Saints'). The processional hymn, 'Hail, festal day,' was sung to a fine tune by the late Dr. Philip Armes. Special psalms were sung to chants by Crotch, S. S. Wesley and T. A. Walmisley. The setting of the Magnificat and Nunc dimittis was that by Sir George Martin in A, and the anthem, 'Behold, God is great,' was by Dr. E. W. Naylor. Mr. A. S. Warrell, organist of St. Nicholas, was the organist, and lent invaluable help in his accompaniments. The sermon, preached by the Rev. Hylton Stewart, Rector of Bathwick, contained some broad-minded and wholesome remarks which might well be taken to heart. He truly said: 'There is a priesthood of the laity as well as a priesthood of the clergy; each has a separate function, and should not interfere with the other.' The concluding voluntaries were played by Mr. W. E. Smith (organist of St. Peter's). Last, but far from least, should be mentioned the cathedral organist, Mr. Hubert Hunt, to whose exertions and enthusiasm the success, musically at least, of the festival was due. He conducted throughout with care and judgment.

Choral Union Festivals have been held in several country districts in affiliation with the Exeter Diocesan Choral Association and conducted by Mr. T. Roylands-Smith (hon. diocesan conductor). At Torrington, on June 15, 200 singers participated, and on the same date at Lynton 250 choristers assembled. The 'book' for the year includes the evening service (Lloyd in G), Te Deum (Stewart in G), the anthem 'Praise God in His holiness' (Tours), and among the hymns is an interesting revival of the ancient and originally Latin hymn 'Jesu, Creator of the world,' set to the also very ancient melody 'Martyr Dei.'

The Annual Patronal Festival of St. Alban-the-Martyr, Birmingham, was celebrated on Sunday, June 19. At 11 o'clock, Solemn Eucharist was sung to Schubert in G, with orchestra and organ. Mr. Townsend was at the organ, and Mr. Alban W. Cooper, organist and choirmaster, conducted. In the afternoon a procession took place through the parish, in which over 2,000 people took part. At evensong the Canticles were sung to Martin in G, and at the conclusion of the service a Solemn Te Deum was sung to Stanford in B flat.

Brahms's 'Requiem' and Mendelssohn's 'St. Paul' were performed in Ely Cathedral on June 7. The choir, numbering about 200, was drawn from Ely, Cambridge, Bury St. Edmunds, and Huntingdon. The band, led by Mr. Haydn Inwards, was largely professional. The soloists were Miss Gladys Honey, Miss Florence Atkin, Mr. Joseph Reed, and the Cathedral basses, Messrs. Haigh and Wykes. Dr. A. W. Wilson conducted.

The Dedication Festival at the Parish Church of St. Mary, Winstead, was held on January 24. The Magnificat and Nunc dimittis were sung to the setting of Henry Gadsby in C, and the anthem was 'The Lord hath done great things,' by John E. West.

On Tuesday, May 24, the organ in Newark Parish Church having lately undergone entire reconstruction by Messrs. Hill & Son, was re-dedicated by the Ven. The Archdeacon of Nottingham. After the dedicatory prayers, Mr. John E. West's anthem 'Hark, hark, the organ loudly peals' was given. The evening Canticles were sung to the setting in A by R. W. Liddle, organist of Southwell Minster, and the anthem by Sir Frederick Bridge, 'It is a good thing to give thanks,' was most appropriately chosen. A short recital was given at the close of the service by Sir Frederick Bridge, who was also the chief performer at the evening recital. Valuable assistance was rendered by Messrs. Render and Endersby (both of Lincoln Cathedral), who each sang a solo and were associated in Mendelssohn's 'Now we are ambassadors. The organ items included Merkel's Fantasia in E minor, the Largo from the 'New World' Symphony, and Sir Frederick Bridge's Organ sonata (Introduction and Fugue). Other recitals were given as follows: May 26, Mr. H. J. Baker, organist of Horsey Parish Church; June 11, Mr. G. H. Gregory, organist of Boston Parish Church; June 16 and 30, Dr. G. J. Bennett, organist of Lincoln Minster.

According to the Churchwardens' Accounts for 1627, a payment is recorded as having been made to the organ 'mender.' In 1802 an organ of ten stops greeted Mr. Brydges on his appointment as organist, and in the next year G. P. England built a new instrument at a cost of over £1,000. Two or three hundred pipes and the choir soundboard from this organ are incorporated in the new organ. The England organ was removed from the screen and re-erected in the south chancel aisle in 1854-5 by Forster & Andrews. In 1866, under the organistship of Mr. Reay, Henry Willis reconstructed the organ, which stood practically unchanged for forty-three years. The latest important alterations, which include entirely new mechanism, have been splendidly carried out by Messrs. Hill & Son, and the fine Newark Church can boast of possessing a magnificent instrument, equal to any requirements of church or recital music. The entire cost of the blowing apparatus is being defrayed by Mrs. Tidd Pratt and family, in memory of Alderman Becher Tidd Pratt, a generous donor to the church and some time Vicar's churchwarden.

The following is the specification of the organ :

The organ in the Parish Church, Plumstead, after renovation and enlargement, was re-opened on Saturday, May 14, when a special service was held. A recital was given by the organist of the church, Mr. H. J. Tufnell, who included in his programme works by J. S. Bach, E. H. Lemare, and Dr. S. S. Wesley. The improvements to the organ were carried out by Messrs. Bishop & Son, of London. Other recitals have been given by Dr. H. W. Jones and Messrs. O. C. B. Hyde, F. A. W. Docker, and Heathcote D. Statham.

Messrs. Rushworth & Dreaper, of Liverpool, have recently built a new organ for Brymbo Calvinistic Methodist Church, near Wrexham, and on May 28 a recital was given on the completed instrument at the Cathedral Organ Works, Liverpool, by Mr. H. A. Branscombe. The programme included 'March for a church festival' (W. T. Best), 'Finale in D' (Lemmens), and the 'Toccata in F' (J. S. Bach). Mr. Samuel Mann contributed some baritone solos.

At Charleton, near Kingsbridge, a new two-manual organ was dedicated in the church on May 26, built by Messrs. Hele & Co. Opening recitals were given by Mr. John Hele and Mr. W. Bee.

The first Bach recital to be held in Johannesburg was given in St. Mary's Church on May 4, under the direction of Mr. W. Deane, organist of the church. There was a large attendance, the congregation being most interested and attentive. The programme was as follows:

Nos. 1, 4, 6, 10 and 12 were played by Mr. Deane.

1. ALLA BREVE in D major.
2. PIANO-FORTE—Chromatic Fantasia and Fugue.
Mrs. W. DEANE.
3. ARIA .. 'What tho' trials wait me here' (Passion Music).
Mr. J. L. WINTLE.
4. FUGUE in D minor (The Giant).
5. SONGS { 'Jesu, Fount of consolation.'
'O Saviour sweet, O Saviour kind.'
Master G. LANGEBRINK.
6. PRELUDE AND FUGUE in E minor.
7. VIOLIN—Air on G string.
Miss BEATRICE STUART.
- HYMN 173—'O Love, how deep! how broad! how high!
'Into Thine Hand, O Lord' (Gottes Zeit).
8. ARIAS { (a) 'My heart ever faithful' (Easter Cantata).
(b) 'My heart ever faithful' (Easter Cantata).
Miss ETHEL LE MARCHANT.
9. PIANO-FORTE—Prelude and Fugue in C sharp minor. Book I.
Mrs. W. DEANE.
10. GAVOTTE in E major.
11. VIOLONCELLO.. .. 'Sarabande'.
Mr. B. R. HUNT.
12. FUGUE in E flat (St. Anne).

A 'Memorial Recital,' under the direction of Mr. W. Deane, the organist of the church, was given in St. Mary's Church, Johannesburg, on May 14, in reverent honour of His late Majesty King Edward. Handel's Dead march ('Saul') was given, accompanied by muffled military drums, and among other items of the very appropriate scheme were Farrant's anthem 'Lord, for Thy tender mercies' sake' (sung by the church choir), Pergolesi's 'O Lord, have mercy upon me' (Mr. A. Laurence Cheeseman), Beethoven's 'Miserere' and the 'Funeral march on the death of a hero.' The congregation numbered 2,000, and were evidently deeply impressed.

Mr. E. H. Lemare had a most enthusiastic reception on the occasion of his recital at the opening of the large organ, recently erected in the New Auditorium, Atlanta, Georgia. The audience numbered 7,000.

ORGAN RECITALS.

- Mr. Leonard Brown, Saxe Coburg Street Wesleyan Chapel—March in F, Guiltant.

Reviews.

Oh, soft was the song. Was it some golden star. Twilight. A child asleep. The torch. By Edward Elgar.

[Novello & Co., Ltd.]

The words of the first three of the above songs, which form the first instalment of a cycle of six songs, are by Gilbert Parker. They are of no ordinary character, and seem to demand a musical outlook such as that of Sir Edward Elgar for their adequate treatment. 'Oh, soft was the song' is based upon a short phrase of haunting beauty that recurs often. 'Was it some golden star' turns upon a former existence—'Once in another land, Ages ago, You were a queen, and I loved you so.' The music is built chiefly upon one theme, announced to these words by the unaccompanied voice, variety being lent by the later accompaniments. 'Twilight' is instinct with solemnity and mystery. The musical setting has the unmistakable characteristics of Elgar's most thoughtful style, and in the hands of a singer of true understanding, must always produce a deep impression. With his great individuality, Elgar achieves some uncommon feature of merit in all his present-day music. In the case of these songs he arrives at significant meaning while expressing himself only in the simplest terms; in this respect his settings resemble the poems. It need hardly be said that the phrasing and accentuation of the vocal part are regulated in accordance with natural delivery of the words.

The same general remarks apply to 'A child asleep' and 'The torch.' The former 'is made to Anthony Goetz (Æ. I.) for his mother's singing.' The poem is by Elizabeth Barrett Browning; the music a soothing and singable melody.

The words of 'The torch' are an Eastern-European folk-song, paraphrased by Pietro d'Alba, and call for the vigour and striking rhythm of Sir Edward Elgar's setting. The last-mentioned song is published in three keys; the four preceding are arranged only for low or medium voices.

The Auxiliary Hymn-tune Book. Compiled, arranged and edited by W. H. MacDermott and N. W. Howard-McLean.

[The Vincent Music Co., Ltd.]

This is an endeavour to supply a want felt by those wishing for a change in the musical settings of hymns, and though in so many cases the tunes already set to well-known words are hardly likely to be displaced, it is to be feared that long use and association have blinded many people to the undoubted weakness of some of those tunes. Though we cannot say we are entirely in sympathy with all the examples in the book, there are many which appeal to us as combining a popular style with good musicianship. Among those which please us, we would mention Nos. 132 and 263.

The chief weakness of many tunes is the alto part, which is often a monotonous 'filling-in,' and some contributors have fallen into this error. Do composers think or extemporise in the early stages of their tunes? If the latter, we suspect the thumb of the right hand, which too often acts as a pivot from which to extend the other digits!

The compilation of such a book as this is no light task, but the large number of good tunes it contains will, we hope, bring reward to those responsible for its publication.

Short Preludes for the Organ. By various composers. Three Books.

[Novello & Co., Ltd.]

Compiled for the benefit of those requiring a short introductory voluntary, these volumes will no doubt be widely accepted.

Variety of style is secured by the number of composers who have contributed, and all the pieces may be played upon a small two-manual organ. When to this is added the fact that the average time of performance is about one or one-and-a-quarter minutes, it will be seen that the requirements of a large number of organists have been studied and provided for, particularly those who have not developed their powers of extemporising.

Among the composers whose names are a guarantee of refined musicianship, may be mentioned: Thomas Adams, George J. Bennett, Myles B. Foster, Alfred Hollins, John E. West, W. Wolstenholme, &c. Their contributions exactly fulfil the purpose which called for them, and no organist may now plead the lack of suitable voluntaries, as he has here a choice of no fewer than thirty, offering variety of style and duration of performance. If we may offer any criticism, it would be that the majority of these pieces are in triple measure, though in most cases this has been subdued by the pace suggested, so that they need not necessarily be considered unsuitable in character.

The books are very attractive in appearance, while the music is clearly set out and printed.

At the annual meeting of the Brighton Sacred Harmonic Society held on May 30, presided over by the Mayor, there was a large attendance of members. The report stated that although the concerts were artistically successful there was considerable financial loss. The thanks of the Society to Mr. Robert Taylor, the conductor, were given in a resolution which recognised that the continued efficiency of the Society was mainly owing to his great abilities and enthusiastic work. The relations of the Society to the recent musical festival were explained and discussed. From the statement made at the meeting it would appear that the Society has some cause for complaint in that it was not recognised as a factor in the festival arrangements.

Correspondence.

AN ITALIAN BASS ARIA OF REMARKABLE COMPASS.

TO THE EDITOR OF 'THE MUSICAL TIMES.'

DEAR SIR,—Mr. Van der Straeten, in his interesting article under the above heading, quotes an example of a bass aria in a hitherto unnoticed opera by Ariosti entitled 'La Fede ne Tradimenti.' This aria is of very exceptional compass (two octaves and a tone), and Mr. Van der Straeten asks who was the bass singer for whom it was written, or is there any record of the wonderful bass singer with such an extraordinary compass of voice?

I think it most probable that the bass singer who sang this aria was the famous Giuseppe Maria Boschi, whose compass must have been phenomenal. Chrysander tells us that Boschi sang the solo assigned to Polifemo by Handel in his earlier 'Acis, Galatea e Polifemo' (produced at Naples on June 16, 1708), and he quotes the following passage as an illustration of Boschi's marvellous powers—two octaves and three-quarters:

It is the more likely that Boschi sang the solo in Ariosti's opera, as he certainly sang in several of the operas by Ariosti in London.

Let me take this opportunity to correct an oft-repeated error in regard to 'Muzio Scevola' as being composed by Handel, Buononcini and Ariosti. Mr. Van der Straeten quotes the fable, and credits Ariosti with having collaborated in this opera, produced on April 15, 1721. It is now placed beyond any doubt that the three composers who were responsible for 'Muzio Scevola' were Filippo Mattei (Pipo), Buononcini and Handel, who respectively wrote the first, second and third Acts. Strangely enough, Ariosti completely disappears after the year 1728, and so does Boschi.—Yours very faithfully,

W. H. GRATTAN-FLOOD.

A MEMORIAL TO DR. WILLIAM CROFT.

TO THE EDITOR OF 'THE MUSICAL TIMES.'

SIR,—Ten years ago there appeared in the Musical Times (No. 691) a very interesting article on Dr. William Croft from the pen of the late Mr. F. G. Edwards, and with it two portraits; the first of which showed Master Croft in his chorister's dress, as one of the children of the Chapel Royal, from a painting purchased by the trustees of the National Portrait Gallery in 1899. The other portrait is from a painting in the Music School at Oxford; it shows William Croft in his Doctor's robes, and was probably painted in 1713, when he took his degrees there in his thirty-fifth year. He was by that time Master of the Children of the Chapel Royal, Composer to Queen Anne, and Organist of Westminster Abbey; the writer of special music for occasions of high ceremony, and already of assured fame. The inscription on Dr. Croft's grave in the Abbey was written by his great admirer Humphrey Wyley Birch, and it may be considered somewhat laudatory; but when it says that 'his celebrated works were commended by the sweetness of his manners, and even by his countenance,' we look at these portraits and assent, for they have great gifts of grace.

The article is further embellished with views of the old manor-house at Lower Ettington, near Stratford-on-Avon, where William Croft was born; and of the church there wherein he was baptised, and where (as Mr. Edwards says) 'he in all probability first heard the Service of the Church of England which he was afterwards to enrich with the fruits of his genius.' This church is now a picturesque ruin; and its successor—'not altogether an edifice of ideal beauty'—to quote Mr. Edwards again—has, since he wrote, been replaced by a modern church, of which we will only say that the people who built it are very proud of it. Here in these latter days we Ettingtonians sing with a particular relish any of Dr. Croft's music we can lay our hands upon, if it be not beyond our capacity. We could not but feel honoured when, at the burial of King Edward, not only were the opening sentences of the service chanted to Croft's setting, but that everywhere 'O God our help in ages past' was sung to that majestic English hymn-tune 'St. Anne,' composed by one who was born in this little Warwickshire village. Of 'Hanover,' or of 'St. Matthew,' I will not try to speak. But how fine a ring there is in Croft's '148th,' commonly sung on St. John Baptist's Day, to 'Lo, from the desert homes,' but too good to be restricted to one day in the year. And the tune 'Eatington,' which we are in parochial duty bound to value highly, finds here much acceptance to Charles Wesley's words, 'Let saints on earth,' as appointed in the new edition of 'Hymns A. and M.'

And now I come to the point of this letter. We have built a new church, and we want a new organ. When we get it, it is in our minds to have carved on the oak case, above the keyboards, 'In Memory of William Croft, Doctor of Music, born at Lower Ettington, 1678, buried in Westminster Abbey, 1727'; and when we are able to use the organ we hope to begin with a service and a recital in which the music is entirely his. The estimate for such an instrument as we need is £250, towards which we have been able so far to collect £105. Will not some of the many admirers of Croft's music and personality send me donations towards this local memorial? I will gratefully acknowledge them both by post and in these columns?

THE 'EMPEROR' STRADIVARIUS VIOLIN.

TO THE EDITOR OF 'THE MUSICAL TIMES.'

DEAR SIR,—I trust you may find room in your columns for a statement which I wish to make public on behalf of the present owners of the 'Emperor' Stradivarius, a violin which, for nearly forty years, has been in the G. Haddock collection.

The recent announcement widely circulated in the Press of this and other countries, that it was being exposed for sale, has led some journals to say that this valuable instrument was 'coming under the hammer.' The trustees do not wish the 'Emperor' to be exposed for sale at a public auction, and in view of the very numerous inquiries that have reached them from all parts of the world, I think it well to say that their wish is that this violin should not leave British shores.

A writer in The Times has suggested that it should be preserved, as a flawless specimen of the best art of Stradivarius, in one of the national art collections. It may be urged that the museum is not the place for a musical instrument; but the 'Emperor' being unique, it stands apart and does not come under the general rule that governs other fine fiddles, whose function is, of course, to delight mankind by being played upon in public by virtuosi.

The statement in The Times has been expressed elsewhere, and it has occurred to the trustees that this may encourage the formation of a National fund for its purchase.

I may add that the owners would make a concession in the event of its being bought by the nation and preserved, like Paganini's Guarnerius in the Genoa Municipal Palace, as a unique example of the great master of violin-makers.—I am, yours faithfully,

EDGAR HADDOCK.

THE ORGAN AT ST. MARY'S, WALTON-ON-THAMES.

TO THE EDITOR OF 'THE MUSICAL TIMES.'

DEAR SIR,—Having read the article which appeared in your June number on 'The former organs at St. George's Chapel' with much interest, I wonder whether you or any of the readers of the Musical Times can give me any information respecting the organ at which I have the honour to reside, in St. Mary's Church, Walton-on-Thames.

There is a local tradition that the organ was built by Father Smith, and that it came from St. George's Chapel, Windsor, and also that it was presented to Walton Church by Queen Victoria.

Sir Walter Parratt says that he can find no trace of such an instrument at Windsor; the builders (Messrs. Bishop & Son), who have charge of the tuning, say that they know nothing authentic on the subject, and our present vicar does not appear to possess any definite information concerning its origin. The organ is now a two-manual instrument, but the second manual is evidently a later addition. There are fourteen sounding stops and three couplers. The compass of the great organ is CC to E (fifty-three notes), that of the Swell CC to G (fifty-six notes), and the pedal CCC to E (twenty-nine notes). The casework is old and of curious design, and has a front of decorated dummy pipes.

Yours faithfully,

HENRY T. GILBERTHORPE.

MEDELSSOHN'S ORGAN FUGUE IN E.

TO THE EDITOR OF 'THE MUSICAL TIMES.'

SIR,—In your current [June] number is a reference to recently-published letters of Mendelssohn, and especially to a Fugue in E, with the remark that 'no Organ fugue in E is to be found in the thematic catalogue of Mendelssohn's works.' If you will refer to Novello's 'Select Organ Pieces,' No. 42, you will find the prelude and fugue which Mendelssohn promised Novello was the composition of Sebastian Bach, as is stated in the following note: 'For this extremely rare specimen of Sebastian Bach's extraordinary musical genius, the editor is indebted to the obliging politeness of his kind friend Mendelssohn Bartholdy, who frequently played it to him, from memory, at the time when there was no copy of the manuscript to be obtained in England. During his visit to Germany this year (1833), Mr. Mendelssohn was so kind as to procure a Copy, and very obligingly allowed a transcript of it to be made for the Editor of this work, who had so often expressed his admiration of the Composition. The writer of the present note gladly avails himself of this opportunity of expressing his best acknowledgments to a gentleman whom he considers one of the greatest ornaments of the musical art in the present age, for this as well as for other highly gratifying proofs of his liberal and friendly sentiments towards him.'

Obituary.

We regret to record the following deaths:

MILI ALEXIEWITCH BALAKIREW, the famous Russian composer, which took place at St. Petersburg on May 30, in his seventy-fourth year. Born at Nijni-Novgorod, he received his first musical instruction from his mother, and later became a pupil of the highly-cultured musical amateur, Oulibisheff (author of well-known biographies of Mozart and Beethoven), at whose house he made the acquaintance of the best examples of western classical music. When he came to St. Petersburg, at the age of eighteen, he aroused the interest of Glinka, the originator of the national Russian School, who saw in him his natural successor. Balakirew's ideas exercised great influence upon the younger Russian musicians, and among his pupils were César Cui, Moussorgsky, Borodine and Rimsky-Korsakoff. He was a fine pianist and conductor, and among his published works are a number of interesting compositions, including two Symphonies, the Symphonic poems 'Russ' and 'Tamara,' the Overtures on Spanish and Russian themes and to Shakespeare's 'King Lear,' and a number of pianoforte compositions, including the famous Oriental fantasia 'Islamey' (one of the most difficult pieces in existence). He also edited several collections of Russian folk-songs. Balakirew's works are generally distinguished by considerable melodic invention, no doubt largely founded on Russian and Oriental folk-music. His orchestration is very brilliant and original, as is also his writing for the pianoforte. In the last years of his life he devoted himself to religious mysticism, and seldom appeared in public.

JEAN BAPTISTE WECKERLIN, which occurred on May 20 at Trottberg (Alsace). Born at Gebweiler on November 29, 1821, he became a pupil of the Paris Conservatoire, where, in 1844, he joined Halévy's class for composition and took singing lessons from M. Ponchard. In 1876 he became chief librarian at the Paris Conservatoire (his predecessors being Berlioz and Félicien David). Weckerlin was a prolific composer, but is best known by his excellent editions and arrangements of old French songs (Bergerettes et Pastourelles from the 18th century). Five years ago he retired from his position at the Conservatoire, and has since lived in his native town.

FRAU PROFESSOR STRAUSS, the mother of the famous composer Dr. Richard Strauss, at Munich, in her seventy-sixth year.

DR. BRIESEMEISTER, the well-known Wagnerian singer, on June 17, at Berlin. The deceased artist made his name by his impersonation of the part of Loge.

MR. A. L. COLTART, of Liverpool, a keen local amateur musician, and one who had occupied the position of chairman to the Philharmonic Society. As far back as 1856 Mr. Coltart had sung in the Society's chorus as a tenor; among the basses being his fellow-townsmen afterwards to be known as Sir Charles Santley.

THE BEECHAM OPERA SEASON.

HIS MAJESTY'S THEATRE.

After a little hesitation the public have decided to display an interest in Offenbach's 'Tales of Hoffmann,' and Mr. Beecham has chosen this work as his chief battle-horse in his present campaign of opera-comique. Next in popularity comes Edmond Missa's 'Muguette,' which was produced on May 25 under Mr. Beecham's conductorship. An uneventful plot, founded upon Ouida's 'Two little wooden shoes,' was unfolded in a well-written English version, vitalized with vivacious acting and sumptuous scenery. The lack of dramatic incident, however, threw the chief attention upon the qualities of the music, which could be appreciated without great concentration. If Missa's sweet strains occasionally made one impatient of their monotonous amiability, their sweetness was not of the sort that cloyed. Whether Muguette was gay or loving or despairing, the music assigned to her part, charmingly played by Miss Ruth Vincent, varied little in character. But the composer's fluency rather than his inventive power obviated dullness, and in the hands of such capable exponents as Miss Vincent, Miss Maggie Teyte (as Melka, the model), Miss Muriel Terry, Mr. John Coates (as Lionel, the doubtful hero and artist) and Mr. Harry Dearth, the production proved highly attractive. Subsequent changes in the cast introduced Madame Zélie de Lussan as Melka and Mr. Walter Hyde as Lionel.

After fourteen years of undeserved neglect, interrupted only by a students' performance by the Royal College of Music, Sir Charles Stanford's 'Shamus O'Brien' was mounted at His Majesty's on May 24. The interval has wrought changes that may lessen the force of the more serious passages of the work in their appeal to some modern ears, but the composer's musical 'brogue' sounds as happy as ever and his consistent individuality can still be recognised. In this opera dramatic action and dialogue help to impart variety, and abundant humour is associated with the character of Mike the informer. Mr. Beecham was fortunate in securing the services of Mr. Joseph O'Mara in this part, for stage experience was not otherwise strongly represented in the cast. Full justice was done, however, to the vocal requirements of the opera by Miss Edith Evans (Nora), Miss Caroline Hatchard (Kitty), Mr. Albert Archdeacon (Shamus), Mr. John Bardsley (Captain Trevor), and Mr. Robert Radford (Father O'Flynn), as well as by Mr. O'Mara. Mr. Hamish McCunn conducted.

Massenet's 'Werther' was written in the early nineties, and has enjoyed a Continental reputation and vogue down to the present day. Sir Augustus Harris's attempt to popularise the work in England in 1894 met with little response, but Mr. Beecham might reasonably expect that the more enlightened English audiences of 1910 would appreciate the work. They have not come fully up to expectations, probably because the English temperament is still cold to the feelings of the Werther type of hero. The music has merits that could not be denied. Its melody, characterization and orchestration are those of M. Massenet's best efforts. The principals were Madame Zélie de Lussan, Miss Beatrice La Palme, Mr. Ellison van Hoose, Mr. Lewys James and Mr. Alfred Kaufmann.

The event of the month was the series of Mozart festival performances beginning with 'Il Seraglio' on June 20. This opera is less felicitous in melodic invention than 'Figaro' or 'Don Giovanni,' and naturally has the conventionalities and formalities of its time, but their detriment to the total effect was surprisingly small. The genius and fancy constantly rose above the restrictions of the idiom, and in the design and orchestration the inimitable Mozart constantly asserted himself. The chief parts were played by two artistic singers—Madame Alice Verlet as Constance and Herr Hans Lüssman as Belmont. The successes of the evening, however, were made by Miss Maggie Teyte as Blonda and Mr. Robert Radford as Osmin. Mr. John Bardsley played Pedrillo cleverly, and Mr. Alex. Calvert was a dignified Bashaw. The orchestra played with captivating spirit under Mr. Beecham.

ROYAL OPERA, COVENT GARDEN.

A VARIED RÉPERTOIRE.

For a complete record of the proceedings at the Royal Opera since the last issue of this journal, it is necessary to go back to the last week in May, which was distinguished by much activity. Though the national mourning cast a gloom over the season, and brought about a diminution in the attendance—as is only natural, since the subscribers are among those who were closely affected by the Royal death,—the management kept consistently to their policy and their prospectus. As was inevitable in view of its success on revival last year, Bellini's 'La Sonnambula' was again mounted on May 26, with Madame Tetrassini as an Amina of high vocal qualification, Mr. John McCormack as Elvino, and Mr. Edmund Burke as the Count. The preponderance of British artists in the cast is an exceedingly gratifying feature, for it is probable that this is one of the means by which the much desired National Opera will come about. But for an exponent of the music of Amina, it will be difficult to find a native artist who has the same command of the best features of the vocal art, for with the Florentine singer her distinctive methods were probably acquired simultaneously with her native air. Whatever, indeed, may be the origin of her fine command of the bel canto, the fact remains that her expression of it is invariably gratifying and pleasing. She was ably and in fact admirably seconded by Mr. McCormack and Mr. Burke, who both showed good acquaintance with the old Italian opera tradition, and sang their music with great freedom of tone and expression. A day later saw the first performance of the season of Puccini's 'Madama Butterfly,' whose strenuous strains and pathetic, not to say dismal story, appear to commend it to all tastes. Some sections of the audience may be inclined to steal out before the poor deserted creature commits felo de se, but everyone takes a pleasure in the quaint and moving music of the earlier scenes. Mlle. Destinn, who can claim to be the original exponent of the part in this country, even though she may have her superiors, was the Cio-Cio-San, and in the latter and more tragic portions of the opera sang with considerable effect.

A NEW TENOR AND BARITONE.

The performance derived both interest and weight from the presence as Pinkerton of Mr. Riccardo Martin, an American tenor, who made his first appearance in this country. Mr. Martin, who was educated as a composer, discovered by accident that he had a tenor voice; many will wish that similar accidents may befall them, for his voice is robust, round and pleasing, and his powers as an actor show uncommon intelligence. These stood him in good stead when later he appeared in Gounod's 'Faust.' This was the first part he ever assumed, and he made his first appearance in it in Italy some six years ago. His interpretation on this occasion did not possess the force of his Pinkerton in 'Madama Butterfly,' and was wanting in the lyrical grace the part demands. His real measure was found in Puccini's 'La Tosca,' heard subsequently. Therein he gave a vivid impersonation of the lover of Floria Tosca. His voice was equal to the demands of the music and the situation, and his acting was remarkable for its actuality. It had many fresh points, not the least of them a dramatic fall at the feet of his torturer Scarpia, after he has uttered his defiance of the ghastly methods of persuasion. The Tosca of the cast was Mlle. Destinn, who has many qualifications for the part. This, it must be admitted, are chiefly vocal, for an histrionically telling interpretation of the character calls for a rather less impersonal style than that with which she favours her British admirers. The best representation of the work was given on June 14, when, with the assistance of Signor Baklanoff, the performance reached a higher level than has ever been attained before in this country. Signor Baklanoff, who is a Russian singer new to England and still in his twenties, is one of the best equipped operatic artists heard for many a long day. His first appearance was made in Verdi's 'Rigoletto' on June 11, and he at once established his claim to recognition by his dramatic and vocally excellent reading of the character of the unhappy Jester. The new artist's great value is found in the unconventional nature of his work, but though his methods are not of the accepted order of things, he never fails to achieve his point, and for a finer portrayal of the part it is necessary to go back a good many years. As the more modern Scarpia, he showed a firm grasp of the import of the character. He betokened the iron-handed, unscrupulous power behind the throne and made it clear, as few have done, that the would-be possessor of Tosca was a villain who would and did stop at nothing. His presence brought a fresh atmosphere into a work that is rather apt to pall in its horror, and stirred everyone around him to their best. The result was one of the most intense representations of the drama that has ever been given at Covent Garden. The Syndicate is to be congratulated on the acquisition of an artist of this stamp.

MADAME MELBA'S REAPPEARANCE.

In the meantime the tale of operatic service is continued by the reappearance on May 30 of Madame Melba. She selected one of her later assumptions, that of Mimi in Puccini's 'La Bohème,' and was cordially welcomed. Into the merits of her impersonation it is not necessary to enter; it is only necessary to state that the note of pathos the part always sounds was not wanting, and with the assistance of Mr. John McCormack, who took the character of Rodolfo for the first time and with marked success, and the supplemental aid of Signor Sammarco, Signor Marcoux and Signor Malatesta, the picture of Bohemia of a past generation was presented with all its fidelity. When on June 14 'Otello,' the wonderful product of the ever-worthy brain of the versatile Verdi, was performed, the Desdemona was Madame Melba, to the delight of her admirers, amongst whom are many who consider it her finest part. She sang throughout in her best manner and made her wonted effect in the 'Ave Maria' and the 'Willow song.' The Otello was Signor Zerola, whom fate has consigned to dusky parts since his previous appearance was made in 'Aida.' But with the further coating of colour necessitated by the character in comparison to that of Radames, much of his vocal power seemed to disappear and his efforts lacked the force tradition demands as due to the part. Signor Sammarco undertook a new rôle in appearing as Iago, but here again association barred the way of complete acceptance of his version, which seemed to lack subtlety. A new-comer in M. Lheureux, a French tenor of pleasing parts, made his appearance as Cassio, but the whole performance was wanting in the distinction usually found in connection with this work.

FRENCH OPERA.

The proportion of French opera in the scheme has been gratifyingly large. M. Saint-Saëns's 'Samson et Dalila,' performed again on June 8 in the presence of the composer, still exercises, as is its right, a powerful influence. M. Dalmores, who appeared last year, returned to the part of Samson on this occasion, and, with Madame Kirkby Lunn as Dalila, won the approval of a large audience and the freely-expressed praise of the composer. Gounod's 'Faust,'—not yet banished as 'old-fashioned,' though there is a little tendency to cast the smaller parts indifferently—has been heard with Madame Edvina as an attractive Marguerite. Hervoice has grown stronger. Mr. Martin as Faust and Signor Marcoux, who has revised his reading of Mephistopheles so as to make it more in accord with the lyrical nature of the version and less of the Demon of Boito, were the other chief members of the cast. The latest operatic form from France in the shape of M. Debussy's 'Pelléas et Mélisande,' has been given with some notable changes in the cast. Chief of these is the assumption of the character of Mélisande by Madame Edvina, who made it less invertebrate and more human than her French predecessor. As Pelléas, M. Devries created an excellent impression by his round voice and good style. Though the work was admirably done with a most satisfactory interpretation of its chief feature—the orchestral score—under the guidance of Signor Campanini, it cannot be said that the form carried conviction on a rehearing. Its fault is dual: the identity of tonality with absence of anything very definite, and the shifting of the interest from its customary centre in opera—the stage—to the orchestra. The homœopathic amount of interest in the characters on the stage, and the similarity of the expressive methods employed in the orchestra, are not in accord with our present operatic diagnosis, though what the future may bring no one can say.

REVIVAL OF 'LAKMÉ.'

Finally, resort has been made to the quarter-of-a-century-old 'Lakmé' of Délibes, with results that have charmed and astonished everyone. The music is as fresh as if it belonged to yesterday. The composer's individuality breathes in every bar. This is expressed in various ways. The Eastern colouring is very successful, for it is not laid on with too heavy a hand, and in point of characterization the composer shows very marked gifts. If never very dramatic in the usual way, the music has the merit of being sincere and of carrying its hearers along with it in its graceful and charming course. There is a certain amusing quaintness in the way in which Délibes endeavoured to adopt a British idiom in his passages for the English characters, and his tune for the British army band of drums and fifes is distinctly ludicrous. But the merits of the work are great, and they were fully reproduced in the admirable performance. Madame Tétrazzini as Lakmé has a part of greater importance than she has undertaken in London before, and she carried it out with complete success. The famous Bell song falls to her share, and she sang it so effectively on the opening night that it was re-demanded. The story has an Indian setting, and deals with a British officer who falls in love with Lakmé, the daughter of a priest of Brahma. For his rashness the officer is stabbed by the father, and cared for and restored to health by Lakmé. Her lover is compelled to appear ungrateful by the call of duty which summons him back to his regiment and his betrothed. Lakmé poisons herself on learning of his intended desertion, and the father accepts her death as sufficient recompense for the outrage the European has committed. At every stage of the work the ear is charmed with delightful melody of an uncommon kind. Délibes, as his ballet music shows, completely understood the possibilities of rhythm, and in his opera he has realized them well, and has clothed the bare measure with melodic vestments of variegated hue. Almost every number in the work is entitled to mention, but an especial effect was produced by the song for Lakmé's European lover in the last Act, and by the number for her father in the previous scene. As the chief male figure, Mr. John McCormack put forward one of his best efforts. With Mr. Edmund Burke as the Father, and Mlle. Bourgeois as Lakmé's companion, the work was very well cast. The scenery and mounting were magnificent, and thanks to the splendid vocalization of Madame Tétrazzini and of Mr. McCormack, the opera, was received with enthusiasm. Signor Campanini conducted.

THE BACH FESTIVAL AT DUISBURG.

In 1850 the systematic publication of Bach's complete works was formally proposed, and a Bachgesellschaft was founded for the purpose. After fifty years the task was completed; the Society was dissolved, and a Neue Bachgesellschaft was founded with the intention of making practical use of the treasures which had been brought to light and made accessible. It was determined that three-day Bach festivals, every two years or thereabouts, should be held in different places. The first took place in 1902, at Berlin; the second in 1904, at Leipsic*; and both were as successful as could be wished. But the third, at Bach's native town, Eisenach, is less favourably remembered. On this occasion the manufacturing town of Chemnitz, in Saxony, invited the Society, and there, in 1908, the fourth festival was celebrated. The local conductors (as some critics objected) wished to display the powers of their orchestra and choir, and took everything at an unconscionable pace. An invitation from Duisburg was accepted; and the fifth festival duly took place last month. The next will be at Breslau; Dortmund also sent an invitation, but all agreed it is too near Duisburg, and a distant province required first consideration. German towns evidently covet the honour of entertaining the Bachgesellschaft. Germany is so very large, and has such an immense number of local centres, that the question of holding more frequent festivals will soon become pressing. Even at Duisburg there was a suggestion (from Henri Marteau) of an occasional extra festival of smaller extent and lighter aims; and it was well received. South Germany has not yet been visited. Several Handel festivals have also been held. There will be a local Bach festival at Heidelberg, in October; and a Handel festival ('Belshazzar,' 'Samson,' 'Acis,' &c.) at Leipsic.

Duisburg, on the Lower Rhine, north of Düsseldorf and near Essen, is a very ancient town, important from Roman times till recently. It became obscure in Napoleonic times. In the last half-century it has made extraordinary progress, tripled its population (now fully 100,000), and by its manufactures and immense coal trade has become one of the most flourishing towns in Western Germany. But having no musical traditions, it has not been connected with the Whitsuntide Rhine festivals, and one can easily imagine that its prosperous inhabitants wished to display their culture. They were fully justified by the results; and a local newspaper triumphantly said, 'Duisburg can never more be ignored by the German musical world.' One unfortunate result of the selection was that not many visitors were attracted, although a rich Russian member offered railway passes to poor organists and cantors, and many free quarters were at their disposal; outsiders expected to see nothing but coals and chimneys. I had looked forward to renewing friendships made two years since in Leipsic, and last year in Vienna, where many good musicians from France, Switzerland, and all parts of Germany had assembled. Not one turned up, much to my disappointment. Plenty of new acquaintances were to be made on every hand, it is true; and at the concerts not a vacant seat was to be seen.

Only one old church is preserved; the Salvatorkirche, a fine 15th century building. The town possesses an admirable concert-room, the Tonhalle, of course with a garden-restaurant in front. No greater hindrance to the prosperity of music can be found than an unsuitable, makeshift concert-room. Accessibility, isolation, freedom from disturbing noises outside, convenience of exits in different directions, all must be considered; and all have been provided for in this Tonhalle. The capital regulations of German cloak-rooms, where each numbered seat has a corresponding numbered peg where hats, umbrellas, and all impedimenta must be left, were not thoroughly carried out at Duisburg; some surprise was expressed, and the improvement will doubtless soon come to pass. Some day Englishmen may adopt this obviously advantageous plan. The Tonhalle unfortunately has no movable roof; this was very badly wanted. Perhaps some well-disposed amateur, anxious to improve the musical conditions of his own town, will read these lines. A proper concert-room, first; competent performers, next; tactfully chosen programmes, third; then the art can flourish. The Queen's Hall and its influence upon London concerts at once suggest themselves.

* The festival of May, 1908, when Bach's statue outside St. Thomas's Church was unveiled, was a local celebration, not got up by the Neue Bachgesellschaft.

In the selections for performance at these Bach festivals, the two 'Passions,' the 'Christmas Oratorio,' the Magnificat, and even the High Mass are now to be supposed already known, and therefore not used. The staple of the programmes will be the church cantatas. There are some 200 of these preserved, and material for interesting novelties among them will never be lacking. For ordinary concerts they are hardly suitable, as they last only half an hour each: their proper place is the middle of a Lutheran service. Nor do they exactly correspond to the anthems of the Anglican service, being more extended and ambitious; at the same time they retain a liturgical character. We can hardly expect them to become generally familiar in England, apart from their difficulty and the orchestral resources they require. Bach looked for their success to their use of the popular chorales, which are not English. A good deal too much has been said by some English writers concerning the connection of the tune and words in a Lutheran chorale. It has been hastily and quite wrongly assumed that each hymn has its peculiar melody, which is used for no other, and that Bach's congregations would always recognise a tune as connected with special words. There were very many such cases, particularly the three Catechism chorales—the versified Commandments, Creed, and Lord's Prayer; but the connection was not a general rule. What we call in England the Passion Chorale was used for at least five hymns, and strange mistakes have been made by some of our writers who have supposed it belonged to the Passion Chorale only.

At Duisburg, six of Bach's church cantatas were performed, and one by his eldest son Friedemann Bach; also a motet, two secular cantatas, and a variety of smaller pieces. It happened that three of the cantatas were founded on chorales which became familiar to English musicians through their use in Mendelssohn's 'St. Paul,' namely: 'To God on high,' 'Sleepers, wake,' and 'O Thou the true and only Light.' All the selections were admirable, except that the programme for the concert in the Salvatorkirche was too uniformly gloomy.

The performances were under the direction of the Duisburg town conductor, Herr Musikdirektor Walter Josephson; the local choirs and orchestra, amounting to some 400, were trained by him. The soprano soloists were Frau Cahnbley-Hinken and Stronck-Kappel; the alto, Fräulein Philippi; Ludwig Hess was principal tenor; A. van Eweyk and Breitenfeld the basses. These six singers came from six different cities. How different from England, where London is everything! The principal instrumental soloists, all of the highest rank, were Madame Wanda Landowska and Professor Buths, for the harpsichord; the local organist, P. Fischer, and Professor Franke, organ; Henri Marteau and Bram Eldering, violin; Dohnányi, Buths, and G. Schumann for pianoforte. The last three united in a wonderful performance of the Triple Concerto in C. Whatever faults might occasionally have been urged against the solo singers (the gentlemen at least), the solo playing was always splendid, and the choral performances almost always were finished, sonorous and intelligent.

The first concert, on Saturday, June 4, contained the Ascension Cantata 'Gott fähret auf mit Jauchzen' ('God goeth up with shouting'); the grand prelude and fugue in B minor for organ and one in C minor; an (arranged) Violin concerto; Friedemann Bach's cantata 'Erzittert und fallet'; with 'Sleepers, wake' for conclusion. Bach's Pianoforte concerto in F minor is known to have been originally a lost Violin concerto in G minor. Schreck, the Leipzig cantor, has produced a new version, presumably like the first. Friedemann's cantata, taken from a MS. collection at Berlin, proved most interesting, and was much enjoyed; quite unlike the father's style, though with suggestions of the father's training, the music has a lighter, more modern touch, presaging the Vienna period. The other items require no commendation, and 'Sleepers, wake' was a glorious culmination, the power of the concluding chorale being almost overwhelming. If ever a congregation should join in Bach's harmonizings, assuredly it is in this one. Specially interesting was the festival church service on the Sunday morning. It was held according to the Prussian Liturgy, which is quite different from the rituals adopted in other provinces.

To musicians from Wurtemberg and from Hanover (which kept its separate church order when annexed to Prussia), the service was as new as it was to me. The music of the congregational responses was unfortunately not printed. The minister speaks his part, while in other provinces it is sung in plain chant; in Hanover and in Saxony he sings the Kyrie eleison. After the creed, the chorale 'Lobe den Herren' was sung in alternate strophes by the congregation in unison and the unaccompanied choir. Then came the sermon, and afterwards Cantata No. 112, 'Du Herr ist mein getreuer Hirt,' a paraphrase of the 23rd Psalm. This, a little-known cantata, is founded on the tune 'To God on high' (compare 'Thou Shepherd of Israel'). The organ prelude and postlude were Bach's Prelude and Fugue in G major, and 'Doric mode.' After a reception by the Bürgermeister in the sumptuous new Rathaus, we repaired to the Tonhalle, where a delightful concert of chamber music was held. Dohnányi, playing (from music) on a curved keyboard, gave the English Suite in G minor, and some welcome pieces by Friedemann Bach; Henri Marteau played the Violin Suite in E major; and 'Non sa che sia dolore' was sung by Frau Cahnbley-Hinken, accompanied by Madame Wanda Landowska on the harpsichord and Herr Manigold on the flute. All these items afforded the greatest pleasure; but the climax was the last number, the Sonata in C for two violins (and continuo), played by Henri Marteau and Bram Eldering, and accompanied on the harpsichord by Julius Buths.

The evening concert was held in the church. The cantatas, 'Schauet doch und sehet,' 'O Jesu Christ, mein Lebens Licht,' and 'Mein Gott, wie lang, ach lange' were performed. The second, in one movement only, is counterpoint on 'O Thou, the true and only Light,' with accompaniment for two trumpets, a cornetto and three trombones; it was probably funeral music for an open-air ceremony, and is most impressive, but was taken very slowly, and the chorale might have been more prominent. The motet, 'Jesu, priceless treasure,' I used to hear in St. Thomas's, at Leipzig, by that unsurpassable choir which was so long directed by Bach himself, and which sang to Mozart; comparisons were inevitable, and were unfavourable. The complicated solo pieces especially can hardly be so perfectly rendered by concert-singers as by the choir-leaders who work together daily. And there was a little flattening in the chorale-verses; it is a great pity that choirs try to sing Bach unaccompanied, a quite un-Bachish effect. All this vocal music, immortally fine as it is, deals with gloomy, severe words; the instrumental pieces were in quite different style, being the chorale-preludes, 'Schmücke dich, o liebe Seele' and 'Komm, heiliger Geist' (the brilliant version in F), and a violin solo. This solo is a concert-movement of extraordinary brilliancy, here claimed as part of a lost church cantata.* Whether sacred or secular, it sounded out of place in this severe programme. Generally, this concert was not quite on the level of the others; the three cantatas were well given, and the solo pieces splendidly, but the total result was not quite happy.

On Monday there was a charming recital by Madame Landowska upon the clavicembalo (harpsichord), consisting of the Concerto in G minor, with stringed accompaniment; the B minor Sonata, with flute (Manigold); the Fantasia in C minor, and 'Italian' Concerto for solo; and the D major Sonata, with viol-da-gamba (Christian Dobereiner). There is nothing that one can say in detail about perfect music perfectly performed, though the use of the flute-stop in the D minor part of the 'Italian' Concerto Finale rings in my ears now. A harpsichord with seven pedals, made by Pleyel, in exact imitation of Bach's instruments at Berlin, was used; the gamba was made by Drobisch, of Cracow, and is dated 1723. And gloriously did the festival end that evening with a secular concert in which soloists, choir, and orchestra all appeared in full distinction. But oh, the heat! The first Brandenburg Concerto opened the programme; then came the delicious birthday cantata 'Schleicht, spielende Wellen' (with new words as 'Spring's awakening'), and the Concerto for three pianofortes in C major. After an interval (oh, for the movable roof!) came the Triple Concerto for pianoforte, flute, and violin in A minor (founded on the prelude and fugue alla tarantella); and then the 'Phœbus and Pan' cantata made an exhilarating, enlivening finish to the festival. The song of Momus, 'Patron, das macht der Wind,' was sung so cleverly by Frau Cahnbley-Hinken that it brought shouts of Da Capo, and was repeated. Dramatic humour was freely employed by the other singers, and the performance from beginning to end went with extraordinary spirit. A huge wreath was presented to the conductor, who was further honoured by rousing cheers and a Tusch from the orchestra, and was pelted with roses by the ladies. Herr Musikdirektor Josephson may well be proud of the festival.

* Was it connected with 'Now is the Grace,' which is for double-chorus, unlike all the other cantatas?

A festival banquet followed. German banquet arrangements are not the same as English. Hors d'œuvres were served while the Bürgermeister spoke at length. Then Dr. Neitzel spoke for a quarter of an hour before the waiters served the first course. Then someone else spoke, and ordered us not to eat while he was speaking. And thus things 'progressed.' There were to have been 'Eisbomben nach Johann Sebastian Bach,' but somebody was prosing, and the waiters were angrily ordered to stop serving, with the result that the ices à la Bach were absolutely liquid when at last we had them. I do not like German banquet arrangements.

The business meeting was, on the contrary, very lively. The question of filling out the figured bass in the Society's publications was debated with remarkable vehemence, even violence. There was a paper by Dr. Wustmann on proposed alterations of Bach's cantata-texts. I was moved to state my opinion that such alterations are only very rarely necessary, and should never be introduced unless necessary, protesting also against some needless changes in the chorale 'Sleepers, wake'; and I think the meeting was generally with me. A discussion on 'Harpischord or pianoforte' fell through from the absence of the anti-cembalist; instead, Madame Landowska gave us some practical specimens upon her instruments.

Excursions and entertainments had been plentifully provided, and the Duisburg Bach festival will remain a delightful memory. Above all, the cembalo-playing, the Sonata for two violins, the Concerto for three pianofortes, the cantata 'Sleepers, wake,' and the concluding secular cantata are not to be forgotten.

BIRMINGHAM PROMENADE CONCERTS.

A number of local musicians have for some five years worked for the furtherance of the annual Promenade Concerts in this city, and it is a pleasure to be able to record that one stage of their goal has now been reached. The concerts this year have proved themselves a financial success, and there is little risk of the scheme being abandoned. Apart from the fact that the present series has resulted in a balance on the right side, the subscription fund that has replaced the usual guarantee fund has permanently removed anxiety for the future, and thus the labours of those who have worked so enthusiastically for the cause have every prospect of adequate reward. A public has been aroused that on one occasion made it possible to use the 'house full' boards usually reserved for the pantomime season; and though this public applauded a Bach Violin concerto and a Délibes 'Suite de ballet' with almost equal gusto, yet the very circumstance of their enthusiastic presence is a thing to be acknowledged as thankfully as possible. There is no doubt that the Promenade Concerts are an educational force, and we may hope that some of the good results of their influence will be perceived in the important new scheme of Philharmonic concerts announced for the coming season. Mr. Landon Ronald, with Mr. Hamilton Harty as assistant, conducted the eighteen concerts. The season ran from May 23 to June 11, filling the gap in the thin line of Birmingham musical functions. The constitution of the band was admirable. At times one wished for a heavier body of strings, but as this was impossible, one found great cause for happiness in the exquisite tone of the brass. There were seventy players in all, some of them being among the best known orchestral performers in England. Mr. D. Reggel was principal first violin, and of the other chief members, mention should be made of Mr. C. Draper (clarinet), Mr. D. V. Emmerick and Mr. R. Pantling (oboi),

Mr. C. Collier (harp), Mr. J. C. Hock (first 'cello), Mr. A. L. Camden (bassoon), Mr. P. Wilson (trumpet), and Mr. A. C. P. Smets (timpani). There need be no hesitation in saying that the success of the concerts was as much due to the fine talents of the orchestral players as to the genius of the conductor, and it was a great pleasure to note the frequency with which Mr. Ronald made them rise and join with him in receiving applause.

In the main the programmes ran on familiar lines. Two or three novelties were introduced, and one great work established as a popular favourite—the beautiful 'Romeo and Juliet' fantasia of Tchaikovsky. The Symphonies of the first week were Beethoven's No. 7, Schubert's 'Unfinished,' Tchaikovsky's No. 5, and Parry's No. 4 (the one in E minor). Other important works were the 'Coriolanus' overture, the graceful 'Rouet d'Omphale' of Saint-Saëns, Debussy's 'L'Après-Midi,' the 'Romeo and Juliet' fantasia-overture of Tchaikovsky, and that exquisite example of humour, Dukas's 'L'Apprenti Sorcier.' Seven or eight opera overtures, from 'Die Zauberflöte' to 'Die Meistersinger,' were also included, and a number of miscellaneous works like the Good Friday music from 'Parsifal' and the '1812' Overture. The 'Romeo and Juliet' poem was so well received that in the course of the season it was repeated two or three times, and there is every prospect that in future years it will continue to increase in popularity. The fine Dukas piece also was repeated each week, it actually finding a place in the plébiscite programme that filled the final concert.

The Symphonies of the second week were Beethoven's No. 5, Tchaikovsky's No. 4, and Elgar's No. 1. The Symphony of Georg Schumann that Mr. Ronald has already produced elsewhere, was announced for performance on Monday, May 30, but owing to lack of time for adequate rehearsal it was not played—much to the regret of those who had heard it even in the preliminary trial the orchestra gave it at the morning rehearsal. The only novelty of the week was a 'Romantic' Overture of an Italian composer which inspired Mr. Ernest Newman to remark that 'When these composers write this sort of music we wish they would write operas, and when they write operas we wish they wouldn't.'

In the concluding week the larger works were Dvorák's No. 5 Symphony, the Bach Violin concerto in E, Beethoven's No. 4 Symphony, Tchaikovsky's No. 6, Hamilton Harty's 'Irish' Symphony, and a work new to an English audience—a symphonic poem by the American composer, F. S. Converse, entitled 'The mystic trumpeter.' It proved to be a work of great earnestness and power, and one undoubtedly deserving of repeated hearings. It should find a place in the scheme of the Philharmonic concerts already referred to. Another comparative novelty largely announced, but not performed, was the already famous 'Comedy Overture' of Granville Bantock, 'The Pierrot of the Minute.'

Sir Hubert Parry appeared on May 27 to conduct his E minor Symphony. An event of equal importance was the appearance of Sir Edward Elgar on June 3 to conduct a programme made up entirely of his own works, except for a Pianoforte concerto of M. Saint-Saëns. There were four solo pianists: Miss Irene Scharrer, who appeared at three concerts; Mr. Marmaduke Barton, who gave examples of the highest form of art in his playing of Schumann's A minor Concerto and Liszt's in A; Madame Fromm, and Miss Marjorie Southam. The array of fine solo violinists was remarkable. If for nothing else, the season of 1910 would stand out as unusual; but no more can be done now than to mention their names: Mr. Leon Sametini, Mr. Aldo Antonietti, Mr. Max Mossel, Mr. Robert Pollack, Mr. Joska Sziget, and Mr. Eddie Brown. At the risk of appearing to end in a carping manner, mention must be made of the singers who have been allowed to appear. There were a few praiseworthy exceptions, such as Miss Dorothy Silk (who sang some fine Strauss songs at a 'popular' concert and drew the warm sympathies of her audience) and Mr. Edmund Burke, but as a general rule the vocalists were not impressing. The Promenade Concerts are orchestral concerts pure and simple, and the vocal element is perhaps not of great importance. But many of the songs, sandwiched between magnificent orchestral pieces, were unworthy of their environment, and more than one of the vocalists was without the talents looked for in such an important scheme.

THE LINCOLN MUSICAL FESTIVAL.

(FROM OUR SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT.)

The seventh Lincoln festival took place on June 8, 9, and may fairly be pronounced a distinct success, for the programme was an interesting one and the performances maintained a high level of excellence, on which Dr. G. J. Bennett, the conductor and artistic director, deserves congratulation. On June 8 the festival began with an orchestral concert in the Corn Exchange, in which the London Symphony Orchestra (with Mr. W. H. Reed as leader and some changes in the personnel) took part, while four native composers appeared to conduct their own works. Sir A. C. Mackenzie introduced two Preludes, the 'Pastorale' and 'Flight of the Spirits' from the 'Manfred' music written for a projected revival of Byron's drama at the Lyceum Theatre. The music (which was first performed at the London Musical Festival of 1899) strikes one as being too good for the theatre, where its elaboration and its fine texture would be lost, but it makes highly attractive concert pieces, and the second is remarkably strenuous in effect. Sir Edward Elgar conducted his bright and naive 'Wand of Youth' Suite (No. 2), which captivated the audience, and Mr. Bantock introduced his comedy overture 'The Pierrot of the minute,' the fantastic character of which gives it a charming individuality. The one novelty of the festival was a Festival Overture in B flat (Op. 30), by Dr. Walford Davies, who conducted it. According to the composer's own note, it is consciously 'modelled upon the old French overture, as it was extended and used long ago for abstract purposes by Bach.' This will be seen from a brief description of its contents. A slow and majestic introduction leads into an Allegro energico written in the customary 'first-movement' form. A Cadenza forms a link between it and the next movement, a Romance, in which beautiful cantabile phrases are sung by the violoncellos. This gives way to a bright Gavotte, to which some chromatic treatment imparts a modern flavour. And this in turn is followed by a Jig measure, with which is incorporated a clever and effective Quodlibet, in which the principal themes of the overture jostle each other to the accompaniment of the lively triplet figure of the jig, a brief reference to the introduction ending the work. Though the work is twice as long as an overture, tedium is avoided by the variety and contrast of this condensed Suite, and the interest is maintained by the admirable workmanship; still, it may be questioned whether, as a matter of policy, even further condensation would not be advisable, particularly in the opening Allegro. But it is a powerful and scholarly composition, and made a marked impression. As the concert fell on the centenary of Schumann's birth, the 'Genoveva' overture was included in the programme, and Miss Agnes Nicholls's fine singing of 'Isolde's Liebestod' was another interesting feature.

On June 9 the two performances in the cathedral took place. For them a most efficient chorus of over 400 voices had been organized from different sources. The nucleus, of 169 singers, were from Lincoln, and had been trained by Dr. Bennett. The Nottingham Sacred Harmonic Society contributed 122 (chorus-master, Mr. John Cullen), Grimsby, eighty-three (Mr. J. W. Smethurst), and Hull, thirty-four (Dr. G. H. Smith and Mr. Doorly). In the afternoon Sir Edward Elgar conducted his 'Dream of Gerontius,' the very fine performance of which formed the central feature of the festival. There is no need to describe Mr. Gervase Elwes's singing of the part of Gerontius, for his conception of it is happily well known, and is generally recognised as getting as near to one's ideal as any reading that is current. Miss Phyllis Lett was by comparison an unknown quantity, and, while feeling some assurance that the musical aspect of her singing as the Angel would be effective, there was less certainty that she would realize the nature of the part from a dramatic point of view, for her emotional nature sometimes leads her into a warmth of expression that would not be in keeping with the character. She kept a marked restraint upon herself, however, and gave a reading which had the right note of purity, and the impersonal feeling which the situation requires. Mr. Francis Harford was efficient in the two bass parts, but was at his best in that of the Angel of the Agony, to which he gave good expression. The choir were thoroughly practised in their task, and sang with confidence and intelligence, while the semi-choir were altogether delightful in quality of tone as well as in precision. The orchestral side of the work has seldom had such justice done to it, and many details came out with a clearness one has rarely experienced before. After such a work it was not easy to find anything that would not come without a sense of anti-climax, but the choice of Brahms's second Symphony was an unexceptionable one, since it afforded the necessary contrast without provoking comparisons. In the cathedral it was highly effective, and it was a joy to listen to such pure and noble music amid such surroundings, and without the distractions of the concert-room.

The chief thing in the evening performance was Stanford's 'Stabat Mater,' written for, or rather produced for the first time at the Leeds festival of 1907. No setting of the text reveals such a keen appreciation of its structure, or makes it so obvious to the listener, and the two important orchestral movements form not only an original, but a most material feature of the scheme, the obvious if unacknowledged pictorial suggestions they contain having the effect of setting the scene for the great Tragedy which the poem commemorates. Of the scholarship and finely-balanced proportions of the composition there is no need to speak, for these are Sir Charles Stanford's most striking qualities, and though the appeal is perhaps less to the emotions than to the intellect, the balance between the two is better preserved than in much modern music, in which the scale inclines in the opposite direction. The performance gained by the fact that Miss Agnes Nicholls was the principal soprano, and one was reminded of the unfortunate indisposition which, at the eleventh hour, prevented her from taking part in the first performance, much to its hurt. The other members of the solo quartet were Miss Phyllis Lett, Messrs. Elwes and Harford, who formed an artistic and nicely-balanced ensemble. The composer was present, but Dr. Bennett conducted the work, which went well, the chorus-singing deserving special praise. After it came Dr. Bennett's 'Easter Hymn,' which was written for the festival of the Sons of the Clergy at St. Paul's in 1895, but which he had re-orchestrated for this occasion. It is a setting of the hymn 'On the morn of Easter day,' J. M. Neale's translation of the ancient Latin sequence, 'Mene prima Sabbati.' The composer had caught very happily the naive character of the hymn, and given it music of a simple, almost pastoral character, for which the orchestral treatment is almost too grandiose, but is highly effective and in itself well suited to a large building and a festive occasion. The soloists were Miss Nicholls and Mr. Elwes. By way of commemorating the recent deaths of the Sovereign of the country and the Bishop of the diocese—King Edward and Edward King—Sullivan's 'In Memoriam' overture was played, and the festival ended with Mendelssohn's 'Hymn of Praise,' in which Miss Carmen Hill took the second soprano part.

LONDON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

At the last two concerts of the series, which took place at Queen's Hall on May 23 and 30, Herr Nikisch was the conductor, and, as usual, his individual views threw new light upon the familiar. Brahms's fourth Symphony, played on May 23, assumed an unwonted freshness and spontaneity that added vitality to its intellectual qualities and secured an enthusiastic welcome. The 'Siegfried Idyll,' Beethoven's 'Coriolan' Overture, and a Concerto for two flutes, pianoforte and strings, were included in the programme, which introduced a rather superficial Fantasia in E for pianoforte and orchestra by M. Léon Delafosse, who played the solo part.

At the final concert, Mr. A. von Ahn Carse's Symphony in G minor, No. 2, received its first hearing in London. It again gave general pleasure with the geniality of its idiom and musicianship of its structure and scoring, which made so favourable an impression on the first production of the work at Newcastle in October. Mr. von Ahn Carse is to be congratulated, not only upon the excellence of his work but also upon the ample recognition its merits have received. The remainder of the programme was familiar, and included Wotan's 'Abschied' from 'Die Walküre,' sung by Mr. Frederic Austin, and Brahms's Orchestral Variations on a theme by Haydn.

THE LONDON SUNDAY SCHOOL CHOIR.

The thirty-eighth annual festival of this great and well-managed organization was held at the Crystal Palace on June 15. The scheme as usual comprised two concerts and two choral competitions. The juvenile massed choir again tested the seating capacity of the Handel orchestra. The young singers were over 5,000 in number and confident in proportion. Mr. Wellard Matthews conducted them with ability and unobtrusive command through a programme, half sacred and half secular, of pieces well chosen for the occasion. The principal works sung by the adult choir of over 3,000 voices in the first part of the programme were the anthem 'Most glorious Lord' (John E. West), the breadth and dignity of which were well brought out; a selection of three numbers from the sacred cantata 'Olivet to Calvary' (J. H. Maunder), which proved very attractive to the audience; and 'Fixed in His everlasting seat.' The second part was short and included the patriotic items 'We love our island story' (Eaton Fanning), 'Allan Water' (arranged by H. Elliot Button), 'The bells of St. Michael's tower' (Knyvett and Stewart), which was performed with attractive crispness, and 'The mariners of England' (Pierson). Mr. William Whiteman conducted all the choral items with conspicuous firmness. A large orchestra played some of the accompaniments and, under Mr. Wesley Hammet, several orchestral selections. Mr. Horace G. Holmes was the organist. Mr. N. G. Briggs is the manager and secretary of the organization, Mr. H. G. Johnson is the musical director, and Mr. G. Merritt the experienced and helpful Press secretary. The competitions are reported in the Competition Festival Record.

CHESTER PAGEANT.

During the week commencing July 18, the fine old city of Chester will be en fête. The occasion is the Chester Historical Pageant, of which six performances in eight episodes, will be given, commencing at 2.45 p.m. daily. Three thousand performers, horse and foot, will take part, and the actors and riders will include all classes of society from lords and ladies downwards. The scene is laid in beautiful surroundings in Eaton Park, by permission of the Duke of Westminster, who will open the proceedings on the first day. There is surely no other city in the Kingdom which offers more abundant material for a pageant. Many stirring incidents of our country's history during the slow march of the centuries, are associated with Chester's old grey walls, its Roman remains, its ancient Cathedral, and its shining river. Indeed, nothing more modern than the happenings of 1645 are deemed worthy of special note, and the first Episode goes so far back as A.D. 78 in representing the return of Agricola to Deva after defeating the Ordovices.

Under the direction of Dr. J. C. Bridge, music will play an important part in the presentation of the various Episodes. There is to be a choir of 250 voices, and the band of the Royal Marines, Portsmouth division, under Lieut. G. Miller, M.V.O., Mus. Bac., will provide the orchestral interludes and accompaniments. The music book, published in handy form by Messrs. Novello, with a quaint pictorial cover designed by Mr. Schröder, illustrative of the Chester 'Waits,' has been arranged and edited by Dr. Bridge. Not only in its musical features but also for its historical notes and preface is the book valuable and interesting, apart from its pageant uses. The editor's literary and antiquarian accomplishments are in keeping with his eminence as a musician, and in producing the pageant music book, Dr. Bridge has sought less to impress his own individuality as a composer of pageant music than to select traditional music and music by other composers which may be appropriately connected with the historical and local features of the various Episodes. He has thus imparted local colour by the introduction of old Cheshire melodies and two fine old Welsh airs, which are introduced to accentuate the intimate connection of the Welsh with Chester. The treasure-store of old English music, ballads, and dance-measures is also exemplified, notably in choral arrangements of 'Come, lasses and lads,' to be sung during the twining and untwining of the ribbons of the Maypole, 'The miller of the Dee,' 'The Cheshire cheese,' and 'Joan to the Maypole.' Interesting also is the selection of music by Henry Lawes (of Milton's 'Comus' fame), and by William Lawes, his royalist soldier-brother, who was killed at the siege of Chester, 1645, and for whom his royal master, Charles I., 'put on particular mourning.' Henry Lawes was apparently influenced in his solemn strains by the repressive atmosphere of Puritan days. His brother, William Lawes, had the merrier days of the Restoration in prophetic view when he wrote his spirited 'Almain,' graceful 'Saraband' and lively 'Jigg,' which are reprinted from the edition of the 'Comus' music which Sir Frederick Bridge has arranged from a suite for viols. In this direction Dr. Bridge might not inappropriately have drawn upon Handel, who passed through Chester on his way to and from Ireland, and whose encounter with Janson, the cathedral bass who could sing 'at sight' (but not at first sight) is a cherished record. At the beginning of the 17th century, Chester could boast of two excellent madrigal writers, one of whom was Bateson, the cathedral organist. His madrigal for five voices, 'Sister, awake,' will be sung in Episode VII. In his notes to this Episode, Dr. Bridge deals with the 'Waits,' or official musicians of the town. An illustration is given of the unique set of four 'Recorders' preserved in the Grosvenor Museum. They were flutes and not reed instruments, and were made in sets like viols, of different sizes and therefore of different pitch. Four examples are printed of the tunes played by the Chester Waits. For the other music, Henry Smart is drawn upon for his 'Waken, lords and ladies gay,' Sullivan for his chorus 'O gladsome Light,' and a vocal waltz, 'Invocation to Deva,' is contributed by Mr. Lewis Hann. Horace's Ode 'Integer vixit' is set to music by F. Flemming, arranged by the editor, whose original contributions to the total of seventeen musical items include a 'Founders' Hymn,' a 'Chorus of Monks,' 'Urbs Syon aurea' (words by Bernard of Morlaix), the 'Hobby-Horse' song and the final 'Ode to Chester':

'We greet thee, noble Chester!
We greet thy kingly men,
As from the mists of story
Once more they rise again. . . .'

In this stately chorus the military drums and trumpets will play a stirring part.

ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

The chamber concert given by this institution at Queen's Hall on June 2, served to introduce a new Quintet for wind instruments by Mr. Manuel Gomez, a scholar. The work is attractively and delicately written, and scored with skill and knowledge. Other student-compositions brought forward were a clever Suite for flute and pianoforte, by Miss Ellen Fulcher, played by Miss Edith Penville and the composer, and two songs by Miss Olive Turner, sung by Miss Phillida Terson.

The orchestral concert given under the direction of Sir Alexander Mackenzie at Queen's Hall, on June 21, served to introduce two excellent and highly promising examples of student-composition. Mr. Morton Stephenson's Prelude to Act II. from 'St. Ursula's Pilgrimage' is effectively harmonized and scored, and Mr. S. Hartley Braithwaite's 'Dawn in fairy-land,' for soli, female chorus and orchestra, is full of delicate and fanciful ideas expressed with technical skill. The remainder of the programme was long and well varied. Among the number of well-equipped artists who helped to carry it out, Miss Elsie Spencer (violinist) deserves special mention.

ROYAL COLLEGE OF MUSIC.

Two College concerts—the 483rd and 484th—were given on June 2 and June 16. At the former, Dvorák's String quartet in E flat, Op. 51, was the chief work in a programme that was carried out with unflinching ability. At the second concert an imposing array of talent was exhibited, especially in the playing of wind-instruments. Eight players, seven of whom were scholars, took part in Mozart's Serenade for wind in E flat. The other concerted work brought forward was Schubert's String quartet in G major. The soloists of the concert were Miss Ivy Tilbrook and Mr. Joseph Ireland (vocalists), Miss Cecilia J. Williamson (violinist) and Miss Gladys Causton (pianist).

TRINITY COLLEGE OF MUSIC.

A vivacious performance of Planquette's 'Les Cloches de Corneville' was given by this institution at the Kingsway Theatre on June 15. A high average of ability, both in their singing and in their acting, was displayed by the principals, among whom were Miss Eveline Matthews, Miss Edith Davies, and Messrs. Priestley, Turquand, Cooper, Trachtenberg and Whitmee. The chorus were natural in their movements and sang pleasantly. Mr. Cairns James was responsible for the production, and Mr. Leonard M. Day conducted.

On June 22, the students' orchestral concert took place at Queen's Hall under the direction of Mr. Wilhelm Sachse. The chief numbers in a long programme were movements from concertos played by Mr. Richard Johnson, Mr. Patrick Thayer (pianists) and Mr. Harry Gray (organ), and a Symphony in E flat of Haydn. Miss Briana Präger contributed a pianoforte solo. The vocalists were Misses Bertha Tomlin, Hilda Felstead, Gertrude Wallis, Mabel Hardy, Edith Davies and Mr. Sidney Sheppard.

THE GUILDHALL SCHOOL OF MUSIC.

A concert was given on May 26 by pianoforte students trained by Mr. John Francis Barnett, and singing students trained by Mr. R. J. Pitcher. Among the pianists Miss Francis Cox and Miss Dorothy Axtell, and among the vocalists Miss Lilian Stiles-Allen and Miss Daisy Bevis, deserve mention for the ability they displayed.

The pupils of Mr. Orlando Morgan gave a Schumann concert on June 9. Miss Jenny Hyman played the A minor Concerto in excellent style, while Mr. Morgan supplied a transcription of the orchestral score at another pianoforte. Others who took part were Miss Kate Richards, Mr. M. Gordon Burgess and Miss Dorothea Crompton.

The orchestral concert took place at the City of London School on June 22, under the direction of Mr. Walter W. Hedgcock in the regretted absence through illness of the Principal. The purely orchestral numbers, Saint-Saëns's overture 'La Princesse Jaune,' Schubert's 'Unfinished' Symphony, and two movements from Sullivan's 'Merchant of Venice' Suite, were all played with spirited and accurate execution, and with excellent body and quality of tone. Miss Margaret Crawford sang Saint-Saëns's 'Softly awakes my heart,' and Miss Dorothy Holden played Grieg's A minor Pianoforte concerto.

NEW SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

SIGNOR BUSONI'S CONCERTO.

On June 8, a special concert was given by this Orchestra at Queen's Hall for the purpose of introducing Signor Busoni's Pianoforte concerto (Op. 39) to London. This interesting work, which was performed for the first time in England at the Newcastle festival last year, consists of five movements: 1. Prologo e Introito; 2. Pezzo giocoso; 3. Pezzo serioso; 4. All' Italiana; 5. Cantico, with chorus (as in Beethoven's Choral Fantasia). The pianoforte is often treated more as a component part of the orchestra than as a solo instrument in the accepted sense. Many of the themes are of a certain noble simplicity, if somewhat austere, and are handled with great technical skill and artistic fancy. On a first hearing the fourth movement, a brilliant and original Tarantella, is the easiest to understand. In the fifth movement the chorus is employed with impressive and solemn effect in a hymn-like melody which is evolved from the first pianoforte solo in the first movement, to words from the Danish poet Adam Oehlenschläger's fairy-drama 'Aladdin.' From a pianist's point of view the writing for the solo instrument is full of interest, laid out as it is with an unique knowledge of the possibilities of the instrument with regard to the invention of passage-work, tone-colours and other acoustic effects. The work is of still greater interest as a venture in form. Its immense difficulties were overcome with great brilliancy by Mr. Mark Hambourg, who achieved a great personal triumph, though he did not succeed in making the outline so clear as would have been desirable.

His playing was full of temperament and vivacity, but lacked the requisite nobility of style. The composer conducted ably, and at the commencement of the concert also obtained a good rendering of his fine 'Lustspielouverture.' In the middle of the programme Messrs. Busoni and Mark Hambourg gave a brilliant performance of Liszt's very rarely heard Concerto Pathétique for two pianofortes, though occasionally the ensemble (perhaps through the unpractical position of the instruments) left something to be desired.

MR. FRANK KIDSON'S FOLK-SONG PLAY.

At a series of entertainments given during the last week of May, in aid of a Leeds charity, the most striking feature of a very miscellaneous programme was a folk-song play by Mr. Frank Kidson. He styles it 'The Golden Wedding; a Yorkshire idyl,' and in an appropriately homely 'Prologue' disclaims all 'dramatic' intentions and describes it in words which may conveniently be quoted:

'Ours is not a play—at least, not quite—

'Tis something like—I can't describe it right.

Merely a picture of old Yorkshire folk

Who've gathered round a farmer's ingle-nook

To celebrate the couple's fiftieth wedding-day,

And tinge with social sunshine what before was grey.

They sing old songs that in those days were new,

And then they chat, and taste the good wife's homely brew.

There's not a ghost of plot; there's no dramatic force;

And so, you see, it can't be called a play, of course.'

What it can be called is a very pleasant entertainment, furnishing some glimpses of social life in the West Riding in 1780, the date assigned. Roger Shackleton, a small farmer, and his wife, Joan, are the couple who are celebrating their golden wedding, and in the company which assembles we have his landlord, Sir George Savile, who 'obliges' with a hunting song, 'Young bucks a-hunting go,' while his lady, who accompanies him, takes part in 'Sir George Savile's minuet'; Abel Carter, a carrier between Leeds and Doncaster, sings the ballad of 'The jolly waggoner'; a poaching acquaintance brings a brace of ill-gotten rabbits as a contribution to the festivity and sings of 'Hares in the old plantation,' much to the disgust of the gamekeeper who is present; Old Betty, a witch wife, gives a sample of her prophetic powers in a series of predictions concerning Leeds which, strange to say, have all been fulfilled to the letter, and Matt, an Irish fiddler, plays the 'Kirkgate hornpipe' (a local tune) for the company to dance to. Other songs which are introduced are 'When Joan's ale was new,' 'Scarborough Fair,' 'The pretty ploughboy' and 'Tis true my love has listed,' and the interest and appropriateness of these tunes is enhanced by the fact that they have all been collected in Yorkshire by Mr. Kidson, and so form a valuable contribution to local folk-love.

The overture and incidental music were written by Mr. Arthur E. Grimshaw, who also harmonized and supplied orchestral accompaniments for the songs and conducted the performances, the characters being taken by students of the City of Leeds School of Music, while the Leeds Symphony Society provided the orchestra. The 'Idyl,' which has been printed as an attractive little book, is of more than merely local interest, and a series of repetitions of the original performance (which was on May 23) have indicated its popularity.

Composed by H. ELLIOT BUTTON.

LONDON: NOVELLO AND COMPANY, LIMITED; NEW YORK: THE H. W. GRAY CO., SOLE AGENTS FOR THE U.S.A.

♩ = about 100.

Piano Introduction: The score begins with a piano introduction in 3/4 time, marked f (forte). It features a melody in the right hand and a supporting bass line in the left hand, with various chords and arpeggiated figures.

Vocal Parts: The vocal parts enter with the lyrics "Praise ye the Lord, in the firm - a - ment of His power, praise ye the". The parts are labeled SOPRANO, ALTO, TENOR, and BASS. Each part has a treble or bass clef and a key signature of one flat (B-flat). The lyrics are written below the notes, with hyphens indicating syllables across notes.

Organ Accompaniment: The organ part is indicated by "Org. ad lib." (ad libitum). It provides a harmonic foundation for the vocal parts, using chords and arpeggiated patterns.

Refrain: The score includes a refrain section where the vocal parts sing "Lord in the firm - a - ment of His power. Praise the Lord,". This section is repeated four times, with the organ providing accompaniment.

London Concerts.

MR. ALBERT COATES.

The young English conductor, Mr. Albert Coates, made a highly favourable impression on his début at Queen's Hall on May 26, when he gave a concert with the London Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Coates at once showed himself to be a conductor of considerable individuality and strong temperament. The occasion was marked by the introduction of a new Symphony (No. 2, in B flat minor) by M. Steinberg, a young Russian composer. On a first hearing the work did not impress with the quality of its musical ideas, but it displayed interesting workmanship and effective scoring. Mr. Coates secured an admirable performance, which realised to perfection the richness of the composer's orchestral colouring. An understanding and appreciation of the classics was indicated by a reading of Beethoven's seventh Symphony that was distinguished by a remarkable rhythmical strength and attention to detail. Between the symphonies, M. Téliémaque Lambrino played Tchaikovsky's Concerto in B flat minor, and showed himself possessed of a beautiful touch and brilliant technique, coupled with genuine musical understanding and warmth of feeling. A number of wrong notes were probably the outcome of nervousness.

MISS FANNY DAVIES'S SCHUMANN CONCERT.

Among the many observances of the Schumann Centenary that have taken place during the past month, the first in importance was the concert given by Miss Fanny Davies at Queen's Hall on June 8. It was broadly representative of Schumann's genius, as the programme included works for pianoforte, orchestra, and mixed-voice choir. Ten part-songs, romances, and ballads were interpreted with noteworthy excellence by a special voluntary choir of fifty-one ladies and gentlemen, many of whom were well-known artists, under the skilful direction of Mr. Alfred J. Eyre. The Queen's Hall Orchestra, conducted by Mr. Henry J. Wood, played the 'Manfred' overture, the D minor Symphony, and the accompaniment to the A minor Pianoforte concerto. The solo part in the concerto was undertaken by Miss Fanny Davies herself, who exhibited a brilliant example of the technique and principles of pianoforte-playing acquired direct from Madame Schumann. The Variations for two pianofortes, Op. 46, were played by Miss Davies and Madame Alice Dessauer-Grün. The programme was carried out with the artistic care of sympathetic and able musicians, and the concert formed a dignified tribute to the master's memory.

On June 15, M. Vladimir de Pachmann gave a concert with the New Symphony Orchestra (conductor, Mr. Landon Ronald) at Queen's Hall. He played Chopin's two Concertos and various smaller works, including the wonderful Barcarolle. His playing was, as it always is, full of grace, charm and rhythmical animation. His manner seemed subdued in the Finale of the E minor Concerto, but his reading of the Barcarolle was inimitable. The recitative passages in the slow movement of the F minor Concerto were made almost to speak, while his execution of the short study in G flat (given as an encore) was the very perfection of ease and elegance.

The enterprise and high ideals of the South Hampstead Orchestra and their conductor, Mrs. Julian Marshall, were again evident in the choice of a programme for their twenty-fourth annual concert, which took place at Queen's Hall on June 13. Their ability and application were revealed in the efficient manner in which the programme was carried out. The chief work played was Schumann's none too familiar Symphony in C (No. 2), which was interpreted with insight by Mrs. Marshall and executed with precision by the instrumentalists. The occasion was also distinguished by the reappearance of Herr Fritz Kreisler, who played the Brahms Concerto with his well-known surpassing technique and warmth of style. The purely orchestral part of the programme included Smetana's tone-poem 'Vltava' and Sinigaglia's overture 'La baruffe chiozzote.' It is to be hoped that this organization will continue in prosperity and progress for many seasons to come.

The Wilhelm Sachse Orchestra contributed to the Schumann celebrations at their concert given at Queen's Hall on May 27, by playing the D minor Symphony. They also did honour to the claims of English music by a performance of a Violin concerto by Mr. J. C. Ames, with M. Emile Sauret as soloist. This work is of a type that should be encouraged, for it steers between over-seriousness and triviality and achieves a genial and attractive character without any sacrifice of musicianly qualities. It is well written for the soloist and for the orchestra, and on this occasion both responded well to its demands. Vocal numbers were given by Miss Evangeline Florence, and M. Sachse conducted his responsive body of players, most of whom are ladies, with ability.

On June 11, Herr Arthur Nikisch, after a visit which has if possible increased the esteem in which he was held by English music-lovers, bade farewell to this country in a Tchaikovsky-Wagner concert given with the help of the London Symphony Orchestra. The former composer's Suite in D was the most unfamiliar but not the most interesting number on the programme. The soloist of the occasion was Mr. Ernest Schelling, who played Paderewski's 'Polish Fantasia.'

On May 24, Miss Katharine Goodson gave a concert at Queen's Hall, assisted by the London Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Herr Nikisch. Her technical fluency and vivid temperament were advantageously displayed in the solo portions of Arthur Hinton's interesting Pianoforte concerto (Op. 25), as well as in the familiar Concerto in B flat minor by Tchaikovsky. The orchestra gave an excellent performance of Elgar's splendid 'Enigma' variations, at the close of which the conductor and the composer, who happened to be present, were the objects of a most enthusiastic ovation.

A long course of the most exquisite Mozart playing such as M. Saint-Saëns has given us during the past month is a rarity that the earnest student could be expected to appreciate more than the general public, who cleave to their preference for a more varied programme. Those who attended M. Saint-Saëns's three recitals at Bechstein Hall were, however, well repaid. In spite of his seventy odd years his playing was thoroughly youthful, invigorating to hear, and distinguished by the true Mozartian delicacy. It was inspired throughout with a rare musical understanding and artistic enthusiasm. The scheme of M. Saint-Saëns's undertaking, which he carried out on June 8, 15 and 22, comprised twelve of the twenty-eight pianoforte concertos. The artist's aim was to draw the attention of the public to many valuable but at present almost unknown works. At the first concert, for instance, a very beautiful but unfamiliar Concerto in G major (Köchel No. 453) was heard, while at the second the Concertos in E flat (K. 482) and D major (K. 537)—the so-called Krönungskonzert—were given. M. Saint-Saëns had, where necessary, composed beautiful and commendably short cadenzas thoroughly in keeping with Mozart's style. An orchestra under Mr. B. Hollander played the accompaniments with unflinching sympathy.

In celebration of the twenty-fifth anniversary of his first appearance in England, Mr. Joseph Hollman gave an enjoyable afternoon concert at Queen's Hall on June 7. The programme was entirely devoted to compositions by M. Saint-Saëns, who had composed a new work for the occasion and who, in company with Messrs. Ysaye and Pugno, lent the concert-giver eminent assistance. The concert commenced with an excellent interpretation of the interesting Pianoforte quartet in B flat. Later, Messrs. Ysaye and Hollman gave a splendid performance of the new composition 'La Muse et le Poète,' a kind of concert-piece for violin, violoncello and orchestra, or, as in this case, pianoforte. It contains pages of interesting instrumental recitatives, and towards the end a melody of great charm effectively treated. Messrs. Pugno and Saint-Saëns also gave a finished performance of the brilliant Scherzo for two pianofortes, and the concert terminated with the beautiful Septet with trumpet. Miss Esta d'Argo contributed vocal solos. It was generally regretted that Mr. Hollman did not himself elect to be heard in a solo.

MADAME MELBA.

As the vocal fleur-de-lis flew to the roof of the Albert Hall on June 18, other flowery ornaments descended by captive airship from the roof to Madame Melba's feet. Her admirers vied with each other and with the prima donna herself in the beauty and magnificence of their offerings: meanwhile a vast, black-plumed audience signified satisfaction in the usual manner. The nuclei of the programme were Massenet's 'Sevillana,' Puccini's 'Vissi d'Arte' from 'La Tosca,' and Bishop's 'Lo! here the gentle lark,' each of which bore a tail of one or more encores. Herr Backhaus played Liszt's E flat Concerto brilliantly. Under Mr. Landon Ronald the New Symphony Orchestra supplied accompaniments and discoursed Beethoven, Wagner and Debussy.

VOCAL RECITALS.

Since our last issue went to press recitals have been given in London by vocalists sufficiently numerous to form a choir of respectable dimensions. Among so great a number we are compelled to make a selection. The newcomers were Miss Bessie Tyas (May 24); Miss Olga Lynn, who gave a recital in conjunction with Miss Maggie Teyte (May 26); Mlle. Olga de la Bruyère, a Swiss vocalist (May 26); Mr. George Fergusson (May 28); Miss Kate Scriven (May 31); Miss Bessie Griffiths, who had previously been heard as a violoncellist (June 6); Herr Rudolf Jung, whose recital was given on June 6 in conjunction with Herr Fritz Hirt (violinist); Miss Eda Rosenbusch (June 8); Fräulein Willi Kewitsch, a capable Lieder singer, who was assisted by Mr. Clement Harvey (pianist) (June 8); Mr. Gwynne Davies (June 16); Mlle. Marta Paula Wittkowska (June 20).

Among the artists already known, the first place is claimed by Fräulein Elena Gerhardt, whose visit to this country resulted in three appearances. These took place at Bechstein Hall on May 21 and 28, and at Queen's Hall on June 10. On each occasion Herr Nikisch was her accompanist, and their association again resulted in many examples of perfect Lieder-singing. Madame Donalda gave a concert at Queen's Hall on May 27, assisted by the London Symphony Orchestra; she sang operatic excerpts by Gluck, Puccini and Nougues, and a number of songs. Mr. George Fergusson, a baritone singer of wide ability, gave recitals at Æolian Hall on May 28 and June 14. Miss Susan Strong secured a large audience at her recital given in Queen's Hall on May 31; doubtless the presence of the London Symphony Orchestra, under Herr Nikisch, and a Wagner programme formed part of the attraction. Mr. Holbrooke and his works were much in evidence at Mr. Reginald Davidson's 'farewell' recital, given at Bechstein Hall on May 31, preparatory to a visit to America in the autumn of this year; the quality of Mr. Davidson's singing augured well for his success.

The Russian Vocal Quartet, whose names are Nicolas Kedroff, Wladimir de Kastorsky, M. Tshuprinnikoff and Nicolai Safonoff, provided some admirable singing at Æolian Hall on June 2, both individually and collectively.

A new song-cycle by Sir Charles Stanford was introduced by Mr. Plunket Greene in giving a recital at Æolian Hall on June 3. The words are seven poems from Mr. John Stevenson's 'Pat McCarty: his rhymes.' The music is characteristic of the composer's more thoughtful style, and forms a worthy addition to his long list of Irish songs.

Arias by composers of all periods and nationalities formed Miss Edith Miller's programme at Æolian Hall on June 3.

Madame Maria Freund showed herself a highly-accomplished singer of German songs on June 6. At the same hall, on June 7 and 14, Miss Janet Spencer, 'America's most celebrated contralto,' put forward a strong claim to the title, except as regards the description of her voice, which is a mezzo-soprano.

A remarkable programme was drawn up by Mlle. Marguerite Babaian for her vocal recital given at Steinway Hall on June 7, with the assistance of M. Franz Liebich (pianist). The first section consisted of ten examples, vocal and instrumental, of old French music. The second section was devoted to works by Moussorgsky, of which three songs 'from an unpublished manuscript' were performed for the first time. M. Louis Laloy, in a few introductory words, dealt with the discovery of the manuscript. The third section was selected from the writings of Debussy.

Miss Edith Kirkwood gave full expression to her patriotism by choosing only British songs for her recital at Æolian Hall on June 10, and her programme was none the less attractive either in anticipation or realisation. The group chosen from the older schools contained perfect examples of a type whose merits are familiar, and the modern art-song was well illustrated in compositions by Caroline Maude, Ellen Cowdell, Frederic Austin, A. H. Brewer, Hermann Lohr and Herbert Bunning. Irish songs provided a further contrast. Miss Kirkwood's singing was of a highly artistic character throughout the recital.

After attending Mr. Campbell McInnes's recital at Bechstein Hall on June 15, we felt a wish that opportunities for hearing him were offered with greater frequency. His pleasant baritone voice and artistic style of interpretation were exhibited in Schumann's 'Dichterliebe' and songs by other composers. Mr. Graham Peel's 'Songs of a Shropshire lad' proved highly attractive on a first hearing.

The Misses Eugénie and Virginie Sassard, the well-known duettists, were heard individually at a recital given by them at Æolian Hall on June 16, in conjunction with Miss Dorothy Bramley (pianist).

Madame Sobrino, who has returned from a world-tour, sang in her best style to a large and enthusiastic audience at Bechstein Hall on June 18.

PIANOFORTE RECITALS.

Dr. Deszö Szántó, professor of music at the Budapest Conservatoire, made his first appearance in England at Steinway Hall on May 25. He is well equipped on the technical side, and frequently gives way to natural vehemence, which, however, his Hungarian temperament prevented from becoming monotonous.

First appearances were also made by Miss Rachel Dunn at Bechstein Hall on May 23, and by Miss Ellen Edwards at Steinway Hall on June 1.

Mr. Herbert Fryer called attention to his powers as a composer at his recital at Æolian Hall on May 30, and showed in that capacity the same fluency that distinguishes his pianoforte playing. Mr. Benno Moiseiwitsch, who gave a recital at Bechstein Hall on June 2, has an astounding technique and mature intellectual grasp that render him perhaps the most promising of the younger generation of pianists.

Miss Marjorie Wigley earned well-deserved appreciation for the expression and accuracy of her playing at Æolian Hall on June 7. On the same day Miss Evelyn Winter gave a well-attended and successful recital at Bechstein Hall. Mr. John Powell's magnificent technique was exhibited in Liszt's 'Concerto Pathétique,' at Æolian Hall, on June 13. On June 17 Miss Olive Blume gave a pianoforte recital at Æolian Hall after an absence from London of four years.

On Saturday afternoon, May 28, Herr Wilhelm Backhaus gave his first Chopin recital at Queen's Hall. His programme included the Allegro de Concert (Op. 46), the Sonata in B flat minor and the twelve Studies (Op. 10), as well as smaller works. Herr Backhaus's interpretations often lacked the poetic charm and caprice which Chopin's works so specially demand, but he played nevertheless very musically and, particularly in the Studies, with a technical perfection which could not have been surpassed.

VIOLIN AND VIOLONCELLO RECITALS.

Violin recitals were given on May 24 by Mr. Sigmund Beel at Bechstein Hall and Signor Giovanni Chiti at Æolian Hall. M. Jean de Ponthière appeared at Æolian Hall on May 26, and Miss Edith Hanson at Bechstein Hall on May 27; both are violoncellists.

Señor Pablo Casals and Mr. Donald Francis Tovey gave two recitals of violoncello and pianoforte works at Æolian Hall on June 2 and 9. The artists were heard together in Sonatas by Mr. Tovey (Op. 4), Brahms (Op. 38 and Op. 99) and Julius Röntgen, and in Mr. Tovey's 'Elegiac' Variations, written in memory of Robert Hausmann. M. Emile Simon gave a violoncello recital at Steinway Hall on June 6, assisted by M. Julius du Mont.

Madame Henriette Schmidt introduced a Sonata in B major by Victor Vreuls at her violin recital at Bechstein Hall on June 3.

Three of the most advanced of the younger generation of virtuosos violinists gave recitals during the month, and in each case their playing put beyond doubt their possession of the inborn gifts of the highest interpretative ability and musicianship. Elman was heard at Queen's Hall on June 4, with the Queen's Hall Orchestra, in concertos by Nardini, Brahms and Saint-Saëns. Szigeti commemorated Carl Goldmark's eighty-eighth birthday—which occurred on May 18—by playing his Violin concerto in A minor and Suite in E major at Bechstein Hall on June 11. Zimbalist played Bach's Prelude and fugue in G minor for violin alone and a miscellaneous programme by other composers at Queen's Hall on June 16. He had previously scored a brilliant success at Queen's Hall on May 25, in a performance of the Brahms concerto with the London Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Dr. Chessin, an able Russian conductor new to London.

Miss Kathleen Parlow, the young Canadian violinist, gave evidence of rapid progress in her interpretations of Saint-Saëns's Sonata in D (Op. 75), Bach's Chaconne, and a Tarantelle by M. Leopold Auer, given at Queen's Hall on June 9.

At Mr. Boris Hambourg's violoncello recital, given at Æolian Hall on June 15, a new 'Ballade' by Mr. Waldemar Sommerfeld was performed, with the composer at the pianoforte.

Sonata playing of unusual excellence was provided by Mr. Willibald Richter (pianist) and Mr. Hans Neumann (violinist) at Steinway Hall on June 16.

Miss Hilda Lett, a sister of Miss Phyllis Lett, gave her first violin recital at Bechstein Hall on June 17, and proved herself a well-equipped player, able to interpret with significance such works as Beethoven's Sonata in A major and Brahms's Sonata in D minor.

At Æolian Hall, on June 20, Mr. Thomas F. Morris played, in company with the composer, an admirable Violin sonata in G minor by Mr. James Friskin.

Signor Livio Boni, a violoncellist of unusual proficiency, made his first appearance in England at Bechstein Hall on June 22; he played Saint-Saëns's A minor Concerto.

CHAMBER MUSIC.

The Solly String Quartet, composed of Madame Harriet Solly, Miss Bertha Tressler, Miss Sybil Maturin and Miss Margaret Izard, were heard together in an excellent performance of Beethoven's Quartet in E flat, Op. 127, at Bechstein Hall on May 27, when they gave a concert in company with Miss Marie Woltereck, an admirable Lieder singer.

It was fitting that the London Trio should observe the Schumann Centenary, as they did at Æolian Hall on June 8, for their admirable pianist, Madame Amina Goodwin, was a pupil of Madame Schumann. Their contribution included the D minor Trio and the E flat Quintet, the latter played with the assistance of Messrs. Wynn Reeves (violin) and Ernest Tomlinson (viola). Songs and duets were sympathetically sung by Fraulein Eva Katherine Lissmann and Herr Hans Lissmann.

The Grimson Quartet gave concerts at Bechstein Hall on June 1 and 13, and played works by Schubert (Op. 161), Dvůrák (Op. 97), Haydn (Op. 76), Hugo Wolf, and Tchaikovsky (Op. 22).

OTHER RECITALS.

Madame Lorraine New, who gave recitations at Æolian Hall on May 31, is a realist à outrance. Others have employed Oriental costume and a dim religious light, but the more material creation of an 'atmosphere' by means of incense was as exceptional as it was exceptionable. Signor Luigi Maria Magistretti showed considerable skill in a long programme of harp solos.

A number of Miss Barbara Thornley's compositions were brought under review at Steinway Hall on June 1. Her style derives an attractive and individual character chiefly from the avoidance of common faults, which is no mean virtue; one was conscious of a lack of happy thematic invention, but a constant succession of musicianly ideas sustained the interest.

Miss Florence von Etlinger (vocalist) and Mlle. Ella Spravka (pianist) gave an interesting recital and decisive evidence of ability at Bechstein Hall on June 6.—At Æolian Hall on the same day Miss Stella Fife played Violoncello sonatas by Grieg and Brahms, and Miss Katherine Eggar submitted, with Mr. William Higley as exponent, a group of her graceful and imaginative songs previously unheard.

Miss Mathilde Verne (pianist) and Dr. Lierhammer (vocalist) were associated at Bechstein Hall on June 9 in a programme chiefly of a classical stamp.

The Central London Choral Society gave a concert at St. James's Hall on May 28, when the prominent choral features of the programme were Elgar's 'Banner of St. George' (soloist, Miss Ethel Lewin) and Dr. Charles Harriss's 'Empire of the sea' (conducted by the composer). These works were sung with much spirit by the choir, who also gave Elgar's 'Weary wind of the west' and German's 'O peaceful night,' with great expression. The orchestra were heard at their best in the overtures 'A calm sea and prosperous voyage' and 'Rosamunde.' The Tannhäuser March and Massenet's 'Scènes pittoresques' were also in the programme. The other vocalist was Mr. Samuel Masters, and Mr. David J. Thomas conducted skilfully.

On May 31, Mr. Cecil Sharp gave a highly interesting and enlightening lecture at Queen's (small) Hall on the subject of Morris and Country Dances. He explained their origin and their differences, and related some of the amusing experiences of his tours through the villages. Copious graceful illustrations of the dances were given by girls from the South-Western Polytechnic, Chelsea, and Mr. W. Kimber, a native Morris-dancer.

A concert of his own compositions, given by Mr. H. V. Jervis-Read at Æolian Hall on June 1, called attention to the artistic merits and fertility of his inventive style. Songs, pianoforte pieces and two violoncello solos made up the programme, in the presentation of which Mr. Jervis-Read was assisted by Miss Grainger-Kerr, Mr. Geoffrey Garrod and Mr. William Higley (vocalists), Mr. Arthur Newstead (pianist) and Miss Helen Mott (violoncellist).

The programme of Mr. Franz Liebich's concert at Bechstein Hall on June 2 ranged 'from Romanticism to Impressionism,' and included an 'Eastern Interlude.' The Romantic period was illustrated by eight numbers from Chopin and Schumann. The 'Eastern Interlude,' introduced with a few words by M. Louis Laloy, was distinguished by Armenian and Greek songs, harmonized by R. P. Komitas and Maurice Ravel, sung by Mlle. M. Babaian. In the section devoted to impressionism, Mr. Liebich gave the first performance in England of five pianoforte pieces by M. Debussy. Mrs. Liebich assisted her husband in duets for two pianofortes.

A Schumann concert was given by Mr. George Mackern at Æolian Hall on June 17. In the Pianoforte quartet (Op. 47) and the Pianoforte quintet (Op. 44) the Misses Lucas played the string parts. Mr. Mackern, besides taking part in these works, played the 'Kinderszenen' for pianoforte. Songs were given by Mr. Herbert Heyner.

Mr. Thomas Henderson gave a lecture that was interesting in both matter and manner at a meeting of the Incorporated Society of Musicians at Morley Hall on June 11. His subject was 'Finnish music and the work of Sibelius.' He described the method in which Sibelius drew inspiration from the folk-music of his country, and recommended its imitation. Musical illustrations were provided by Miss Palgrave-Turner, Miss Grossholtz, Mr. Francis Harford, Mr. Heinrich Dittmar and Mr. Orton Bradley.

Miss Katherine Ruth Heyman included some clever songs of her own composition in her programme at Bechstein Hall on June 20. In company with Mr. Jan Hambourg she played César Franck's Violin sonata, and was heard alone in Liszt's B minor Pianoforte sonata. Miss Clare Hamilton was the vocalist.

Suburban Concerts.

The Alexandra Palace Choral Society performed Dvorák's 'Stabat Mater' on May 28, under Mr. Allen Gill's direction. The style of their performance was in every aspect worthy of their high reputation. The programme, which was designed 'In Memoriam,' included Dr. James Lyon's eight-part chorus, 'Blessed are the dead.' The soloists were Miss Perceval Allen, Miss Phyllis Lett, Mr. Alfred Heather and Mr. Peter Dawson, and Mr. G. C. Cunningham was the organist.

The Emmanuel (Lambeth) Choral Society, under the direction of Mr. R. C. Law, organist and choir-master of Emmanuel Church, Lambeth, gave their second concert of the season on May 25. The principal feature of the evening was Van Bree's 'St. Cecilia's Day,' the choruses of which were sung with good tone, spirit, and precision. The solo parts were well rendered by Miss F. Reynolds and Miss P. Law. German's 'Who is Sylvia,' Pearsall's 'When Allen-a-Dale' and Prout's 'Hail to the chief' were included in the programme.

The usual Spring concert was given by the students of Morley College in the lecture hall of that institution on May 28. The principal feature of the programme consisted of Act II. of Gluck's 'Orpheus,' which was well performed by the choir and orchestra. Miss Alice Haslegrove in the part of Orpheus displayed a well-trained voice of excellent quality. The orchestra played the Andante from Mendelssohn's 'Italian' Symphony, Tchaikovsky's 'Pique Dame' Suite, Elgar's 'Pomp and Circumstance' March (No. 2, in A minor) and an arrangement of seven Scottish airs, with delicacy and spirit. Miss Beatrice Payne, and Messrs. Hoare, Raggett and Whitehead were the other solo vocalists, and Miss Cécilia Renouf gave an artistic rendering of Raff's 'La Fausse' and Rachmaninoff's Prelude in C minor. Mr. Gustav von Holst, who superintends the musical education of the students, conducted, and may be heartily congratulated on the satisfactory progress and results achieved.

Mr. Ernest Penfold gave a concert at the Hampstead Conservatoire on May 30, in which the programme included Miss Lehmann's song-cycle 'In a Persian garden.' This was effectively rendered by Miss Maude Wilby, Miss May Hayden, Mr. Penfold and Mr. Allen Engles. The concert-giver, who possesses a light and agreeable tenor voice, was also heard in 'Oh Dolore' from Verdi's 'Attila' and Sarga's 'Sekah Allah.' Miss Winifred Gower and Mr. Charles Hambourg contributed violin and violoncello solos successfully, and Miss Mollie Mercer was the accompanist.

A successful concert was given by Mr. Edward G. Croager at the Hampstead Conservatoire on May 31. One of the chief features of the programme was the performance of the Pianoforte quartet in B flat, Op. 41, of Camille Saint-Saëns, played by Messrs. Harold Bonarius, Robert Grimson, Lennox Clayton and the concert-giver. The latter also played with much expression and effect 'The Naiads' (H. Farjeon), 'Liebeswalzer' (Moszkowski), and a Mazurka of his own composition. The other artists who appeared were Miss Dorothy Webb, Madame Blanche Newcombe, Mr. Frank Tebbutt and Mr. John Challis, and Mr. Charles Fry recited the Invocation to Astarte from Schumann's 'Manfred,' accompanied by Mr. Edward G. Croager.

NORTH SHORE FESTIVAL CONCERTS.

(FROM A CORRESPONDENT.)

Evanston, Ills., the home of Northwestern University, twelve miles north of the city of Chicago, is rapidly becoming celebrated on account of the North Shore Festival Concerts, the second annual series of which took place on June 1, 2 and 4. The Gymnasium in which these concerts were held is splendidly adapted for just such a purpose, holds four thousand people, and is the gift of Mr. James A. Patten, a public-spirited citizen of Evanston, and one of the trustees of the University. The first concert opened with Saint-Saëns's 'Samson and Delilah,' sung by the choir of 600 voices, with Madame Schumann-Heink, Messrs. David Bispham, Evan Williams, Albert Boroff, Marion Green and W. B. Ross as soloists, the accompaniments being played by the entire Thomas Orchestra of ninety men. It is not necessary to go into a discussion of the work, but the soloists were eminently satisfactory, Madame Schumann-Heink and Messrs. Bispham and Williams bearing the brunt of the work in that direction, and the others doing their part as opportunity offered. The Orchestra entered into the spirit of the occasion, and played with evident interest in the success of the whole composition. Realising that this is only the second year of the choir, the results attained are remarkable. Although there are a large number of experienced singers in it, the only explanation is work, and the ability of the conductor to get the maximum amount of music out of the choir, and it would be almost ungrateful—in the face of such sincere endeavour—to single out the parts on which to lavish praise. Suffice it to say that they all acquitted themselves with great credit, and there were no mistakes made large enough to interfere in any way with the general effect. Thursday evening, June 2, was a miscellaneous programme, devoted to solos by Madame Osborn Hannah and David Bispham, the latter half of the programme being selections from the works of Wagner, by soloists and orchestra. An interesting feature was the performance of the overture 'Paola and Francesca' by Arne Oldberg, conducted by the composer, a member of the faculty of Northwestern University School of Music, of which Dean P. C. Lutkin is the head. This work had already been honoured with a performance by the Thomas Orchestra in their regular concerts, and was well received by the audience. For the children's concert, on Saturday afternoon, June 4, every seat in the house was sold, and the choir of 1,200 voices justified the expectations of the audience. Madame Schumann-Heink was in her happiest mood, and, turning to the audience, asked to be excused while she sang an encore to the children, rendering in her most inspired manner 'But the Lord is mindful of his own.' The children gave a good account of themselves in 'My old Kentucky home,' 'The Rose of Allendale,' and in the cantata 'A legend of Bregenz,' by Wilfred Bendall, besides some music written by Dean Lutkin. It was perfectly evident that the best things in music had been sought after and attained. The beauty of tone and expression were decidedly there.

Verdi's 'Requiem,' on Saturday evening, June 4, was the last and most ambitious effort of the festival choir, the solo parts being taken by Madame Osborn Hannah, Mrs. Lutiger Gannon, Messrs. Evan Williams and Allen Hinckley. In this work the choir showed ability and enthusiasm rarely met with, and after the singing of the 'Sanctus' the audience demanded a repetition. The training had been so complete and thorough, and the spirit of the festival had been so instilled into the choir, that probably Dean Lutkin never had his wishes so thoroughly respected as in the rendering of this work. The attack was clean and prompt, and the tone beautiful.

To Professor Lutkin belongs the credit of this festival. Not only is he a thorough and painstaking drillmaster, but he has the faculty of inspiring with enthusiasm all those who work with him, and making them feel their individual responsibility. His reward must be in the magnificent response made by the choir. Such an undertaking, carried out in such splendid fashion, means infinitely more than material prosperity to any community.

MUSIC IN VIENNA.

(BY OUR SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT.)

Vienna, June 15, 1910.

The Imperial Court Opera concluded with an Italian season which, though the prices of admission were doubled, was liberally patronised. The selection of operas included only the best that Italy could produce, and the opportunity of hearing real cantabile singing, as contrasted with the continually deteriorating 'Sprechgesang' (spoken song) of the modern German music-drama, was very welcome. The first place among the artists was taken by the baritone, Battistini. His beautiful and easily produced voice, his art of bel canto and warmth of style, far outweigh certain mannerisms. He had a most excellent reception and was quite brilliant in Donizetti's 'Maria di Rohan.' The prima donna, Signora Edyth de Lys, has a wonderful compass, splendid execution and dramatic power. Less perfect, though very satisfactory, is the coloratura singer, Elvira de Hidalgo. The contralto, Signora Lollini, fills her place well. Another contralto, Signora Elisa Bruno, who appeared as Amneris in Verdi's 'Aida,' has a very powerful voice and a noble and beautiful presence. Three different tenors, viz., Signori Francesco Fazzini, Alfredo Piccaver, and Lara, courted the favour of the public. The first two had considerable success, but the latter made a complete fiasco. On the other hand, the basso, Arimondi, with his dark, sonorous voice, filled the great house perfectly, and was much appreciated, as was also the baritone, Signor Formichi. A special ovation was accorded the fiery and clever conductor, Maestro Arturo Vigna, who secured a particularly effective performance of 'Aida.'

The Court Opera has closed its doors and peace reigns within its walls. Director von Weingartner has for the time being scored over his adversaries, and will return to renewed activity during the second half of August.

DEVON.

A new piece of considerable importance was sung by the Plymouth Orpheus Male-Voice Choir at their concert in Plymouth on May 28, this being a really fine setting by David Parkes, for soloists or chorus, of Longfellow's poem 'The elected knight.' The dramatic features of the story are not only illustrated but intensified in the significant musical work, which is musically, artistic, and essentially vocal. The choir, numbering about ninety voices, gave a very good first performance in spite of obvious nervousness, and also sang pieces by de Rillé, Müller, Neumann and Dudley Buck. The soloists included Messrs. Ludwig Lebel (violinello) and Stanley Parsonson (pianoforte). Mr. David Parkes conducted. Miss Florence Smith deserved praise for her excellent and successful effort to celebrate the centenary of the birth of Schumann by giving a pianoforte recital in Plymouth on June 8, which had all the prominence and advantage of non-competition, this being the only recognition of the event in the neighbourhood. Miss Smith, who is a pupil of Mr. Franklin Taylor, displayed her intimate knowledge of the Schumann cult and idiom in a highly interesting programme which included the Fantasia in C major and the Etudes Symphoniques, with smaller pieces. Miss Lily Smith (violin) collaborated in the Sonata in A minor, and Madame Alice Prowse sang 'Lieder.'

Exeter was not entirely without its Schumann celebration in recognition of the centenary of the composer's birth, for on June 10 Miss Gertrude Gauntlett gave a biographical and critical lecture, copiously illustrated by herself (pianoforte), Miss Lillian Tuckwell (second pianoforte), Miss Ruby Davy (violin), and Mr. Frederic James (vocalist). The Sonata (Op. 121) for violin and pianoforte, an Andante and Variations for two pianofortes, the 'Phantasiestücke' and 'Faschingsschwank aus Wein' were selected as representative instrumental works.

LIVERPOOL.

From the eighth annual report and balance sheet of the Liverpool Welsh Choral Union, it would appear that their financial position is no less satisfactory than their musical. The total receipts for last season amounted to £1,054, and the expenditure to £879, leaving a credit balance of £175. In comparing the profits of the three concerts, the 'Messiah' easily leads with £125, followed by 'Hiawatha' £78, and Bach's B minor Mass £56. The proceeds of the extra performance of Mr. Harry Evans's cantata 'Dafydd ap Gwilym' (sung in Welsh) were given to the building fund of the University College of North Wales. The executive committee recorded their high appreciation of Mr. Harry Evans's services as conductor, and thanks were given to Madame Maggie Evans (accompanist at rehearsals), to Mr. W. H. Parry (deputy conductor), and to the members of the choir for their devotion and enthusiasm displayed throughout a lengthened and laborious season.

In honour of Schumann, a Centenary concert devoted to his music was given in the Liverpool Institute on June 15, when a comprehensive selection was offered of works illustrating the scope and range of Schumann's genius, notably the Pianoforte quintet (Op. 44) in E flat major, and the Quartet in F (Op. 41), which were ably interpreted by Mr. Donald Francis Tovey and a string quartet of players which included Miss Edith Robinson, Miss Isabel McCullagh, Miss Lily Simms, and Miss Mary McCullagh. The vocalist, Miss Edith McCullagh, sang several of Schumann's immortal songs with style and expression.

The City organist, Dr. A. L. Peace, and his son Mr. Lister R. Peace, organist of Queens' College, Cambridge, have been recently receiving congratulations upon the success of the latter at Cambridge in attaining his B.A. degree, and passing his first Mus. Bac. examination at the head of the list.

MANCHESTER.

Music has languished here during the past month; still a few fugitive concerts have been given by Miss Ellen Arthan and Miss Alice Dill, and a curious compound of Greek recital from Euripides, English ballad-songs and Scandinavian pianoforte music was given on June 7 by Miss E. Smiltou, Miss Belmont and Madame Annie Walker.

An orchestral concert in connection with the Manchester School of Music, held on June 4, was conducted by Mr. Albert J. Cross, when works by Holbrooke, Bantock and MacDowell were played for the first time here.

Dr. J. Kendrick Pyne gave an interesting lecture in the Whitworth Hall of the University (where Guilman is to play on July 1), before the Incorporated Society of Musicians. The lecturer's views on modern organs and modern playing were much the most interesting part of the lecture; he deplored excessive mechanical aids to execution and change of registration, quoting W. T. Best and Guilman in support of his contention.

At the June 16 council meeting of the Royal Manchester College of Music, various gifts to the Students' Sustentation Fund were announced, and it was reported that the following external examiners will act in the diploma examinations: Miss Fanny Davies, Mr. Alfred Gibson, Dr. E. C. Bairstow and Dr. G. J. Bennett.

At the annual meeting of the Hallé Concerts Society it was announced that Dr. Richter would again conduct all the concerts and that the 'Messiah' would be an extra concert, Bach's 'Christmas Oratorio' displacing the more popular work in the usual series. Parts II. and III. of Bantock's 'Omar' will be given. Mr. Van Rooy will sing at one of the Wagner concerts, and arrangements are pending for the engagement of Paderewski and the production here of his Symphony. There is also to be a Schumann commemoration concert.

The University of Durham has conferred the Degree of Doctor of Music, honoris causa, on Miss Ethel Smyth.

The choral services at Hereford Cathedral will be suspended from August 1 to 20 on account of the choir holidays.

MUSIC AT OXFORD.

The first concert for notice this term was the one on Easter Sunday evening in the Town Hall, when the Free Church Choir Union gave a selection from the 'Messiah.' The choruses were well sung, notably 'Behold the Lamb of God' and 'Lift up your heads.' The solo parts also were well rendered, Mr. Lomas making a great impression by his artistic singing of 'Behold, I shew you a mystery' and 'The trumpet shall sound.' Mr. Wiblin conducted with great care, and Mr. Radbone was the organist. The Hall was packed, admission being free, but a collection was made in the building which amply paid all expenses.

On May 20 (the day of the funeral of King Edward) Brahms's 'Requiem' was given in the Town Hall by the Choral and Philharmonic Society and Bach Choir, under Dr. Allen's able baton, when an excellent rendering was secured. The soloists were Miss Gladys Honey and Mr. Campbell McInnes. As the work had been given several times previously, the choruses are very well known, but we cannot refrain from mentioning the admirable rendering of 'Behold, all flesh is as the grass,' and 'How lovely is Thy dwelling-place.'

We hardly know whether we are stepping a little out of place in chronicling in these columns the three performances of Beethoven's opera 'Fidelio,' which were given in the New Theatre on June 9, 10, 11. The performances were of special musical interest, being under the direction of Dr. Allen, and all four Overtures composed for the work were played—'Fidelio' before each performance, and between the Acts each night one of the three 'Leonore' overtures. This was a capital idea of Dr. Allen's; and when we add that the Oxford players were supplemented by others from the London Symphony and Queen's Hall Orchestras, to say that Beethoven's delightful music was well rendered must be merely a foregone conclusion—indeed, we cannot remember hearing a finer band in the theatre. The actors—who did well for a first essay—were mostly amateurs, under the direction we believe of Miss Rosina Filippi (Mrs. H. M. Dowson).

On June 16, Sir Walter Parratt, the Professor of Music, gave his terminal lecture in the Sheldonian Theatre, on Dr. Burney's travels to collect materials for a 'General History of Music.' This proved a very attractive subject, and drew together an appreciative audience; indeed the popular Professor seemed thoroughly to enjoy it himself. The many curious anecdotes related of Burney were very amusing, but on the whole it was clear, said the Professor, that the Continental musical performances were very far from pleasing Burney, and that many of them might be labelled 'distinctly bad.' When at Berlin, he found sacred music in a deplorable state, the King having no taste for anything but secular music of a certain type. Whenever duty obliged him to listen to oratorio or music of a serious cast, he would loudly exclaim, 'How all this smells of the church!' It was a pity, said Sir Walter, that Burney could never understand the glorious music of J. S. Bach; but even John Hullah was much the same, for he used to say that 'Bach's "48" might be good mechanical exercises, but no pulse would ever beat any quicker or slower by their influence'! Incidentally, the Professor paid a remarkable tribute to the genius of Handel, whom Burney much admired: 'Having Handel amongst us for so many years did great things for the music of England, his influence for good being truly immense.' Then again, 'no finer vocal practice can be found anywhere than in the superb oratorio-choruses of Handel. Some of the best and finest of our Northern Choral Societies are proud to acknowledge this fact, and they owe their present exalted positions, in a great measure, to the splendid practice afforded by his choruses. Handel cannot be dwarfed, for he was a thoroughly great man.'

The same evening Queen's College gave its Jubilee Concert. Half-a-century of excellent work deserves hearty congratulation, and we only wish we had space to quote even a few of the charming works composed especially for this Society. Amongst its conductors, however, we recall with pleasure Mr. Hamilton Clarke, Dr. T. W. Dodds, Dr. F. Iliffe, and the present conductor, Dr. G. G. Stocks. An 'Introductory note' to the programme pays a deservedly high tribute to the work of the Rev. Dr. Mee, who has not only composed works for the Society and financed it in times of stress and difficulty, but has been a member of its choir in every concert since 1872. The principal items performed were Mendelssohn's 'Melusine Overture' (Op. 32), Schubert's 'Gesang der Geister über den Wassern' (Op. 167), and Beethoven's Symphony No. 8 (Op. 93).

The Sunday evening concerts have been continued under the able direction of Dr. Walker.

Foreign Notes.

ARNHEIM (HOLLAND).

A new work by August Bungert, 'Warum? Woher? Wohin?' for solo voices, chorus and orchestra, was recently produced with success under the conductorship of Professor M. A. Brandt-Buys.

BADEN-BADEN.

The Brahms festival took place on May 19-22. During the four days, the Klingler Quartet played a great number of the master's chamber works, including the String quartets, Op. 51, Nos. 1 and 2 and Op. 67, the String quintets, Op. 88 and 111, and the Sextets, Op. 18 and 33. The works conducted by Generalmusikdirector Fritz Steinbach, at an orchestral concert, were the second Symphony, the Rhapsody for alto voice and male chorus, the 'Tragic overture,' and the Concerto for violin and violoncello. On May 21 a memorial plate was unveiled on the house in the suburb Baden-Lichtental, where Brahms, during the sixties, frequently spent his summer holidays and where he composed some of his best works, including parts of the German Requiem.

BRUSSELS.

Many interesting performances have lately been given at the Théâtre Royale de la Monnaie. The Monte Carlo Opera Company, under the management of M. Raoul Gunsbourg, have given interesting representations of Italian operas and of Massenet's latest work, 'Don Quichotte,' with Chaliapin in the title-part. An excellent performance of Wagner's 'Ring des Nibelungen,' in German, took place under the conductorship of Herr Otto Lohse, with Messrs. van Dyck, van Rooy and Madame Kirkby Lunn in the cast. Towards the end of May, Richard Strauss's 'Elektra' was presented for the first time and created a great sensation. The work was given in a French translation by M. Gauthier-Villars. The performance was ably conducted by M. Sylvain Dupuis. Madame Friché played the title-part.—The festival concerts at the Universal Exhibition were inaugurated on May 29. At the second of these functions, on June 19, Tinel's interesting oratorio 'Franciscus' was performed.

COLOGNE.

At the Opera House, Heinrich Zöllner's beautiful and unjustly neglected fairy opera 'Die versunkene Glocke' (founded on Gerhard Hauptmann's fairy-drama), was recently revived with much success.

DARMSTADT.

The third chamber music festival took place on June 3, 4, 5. Besides classical works by Bach, Mozart and Schumann, several novelties and unfamiliar compositions were heard, including Hans Pfitzner's Pianoforte quintet (Op. 23) and a Trio by Stephan Krehl. The production of a beautiful String quartet by Felix Woyrsch and the first German performance of Max Regner's new and very interesting Pianoforte quartet (Op. 113), recently produced at Zürich, were the principal features of the festival.

DRESDEN.

Edmund Kretschmer's five-act opera 'Die Folkunger' was recently performed for the hundredth time.—To commemorate the Schumann centenary, a concert of the master's church music was given at the Kreuzkirche. Herr Alfred Sittard played two of the organ fugues on the name of Bach, and under the conductorship of Herr Otto Richter the Kreuzchor gave an impressive rendering of the Mass in C minor. The work contains many beauties, and constitutes Schumann's highest achievement in this class of music.

FREIBURG (IN BADEN).

On May 2, Alexander Adam's 'König Enzios Tod,' for solo, chorus, and orchestra, was successfully produced under the composer's direction.—A three days' chamber music festival took place from May 3-6. The proceedings were attended with much success, and the programme offered an excellent selection of the best classical chamber music, including Schubert's Octet and Brahms's Pianoforte quintet, Op. 34.

HALLE.

In the week of May 2-8, the Municipal Theatre gave special Wagner festival performances, including representations of the 'Ring des Nibelungen' and 'Die Meistersinger.' Among the artists were Mesdames Ellen Gulbrandsen, Fleischer-Edel, Reuss-Belce, and Messrs. Briesemeister, Breuer and Ernst Kraus.

KIEL.

The eighth Schleswig-Holsteinische Musikfest took place on June 5 and 6. The festival was opened with a successful morning concert, consisting entirely of works by Schumann, whose Symphonic Etudes (played by Herr Arthur Schnabel), Spanisches Liederspiel and Pianoforte quintet were heard to great advantage. Beethoven's ninth Symphony, Bach's 'Magnificat,' and the Rhapsody for alto voice and male chorus of Brahms formed the programme of an orchestral concert. The climax of the festival was reached with an excellent performance of Handel's oratorio 'Deborah,' given under the conductorship of Professor Karl Panzner.

KÖNIGSBERG.

The second Ostpreussische Musikfest was held from May 6 to 9. The works were mainly by classical composers, but a place was given to Richard Strauss's 'Tod und Verklärung.' Of choral works, Handel's 'Messiah' (as edited by Chryster) and excerpts from Bach's Magnificat and the great B minor Mass were heard. The performances of unfamiliar instrumental works, which included Bach's Concerto for three pianofortes and string orchestra, Mozart's Symphonic concertante and the beautiful Serenade for wind instruments in D major, proved very enjoyable. Brahms's C minor Symphony and 'Gesang der Parzen,' and the Pianoforte concerto by Schumann (soloist, Herr Arthur Schnabel), also figured in the excellent programme. The conductor of the festival was Herr Fritz Steinbach.

LAUCHSTEDT.

The Festspiele, the programme of which had this year been arranged to show the position of comic opera in Goethe's time, took place on May 29, 31 and June 1. The works selected were Gluck's 'Der betrogene Kadi,' Weber's 'Abu Hassan,' and 'La serva padrona' by Pergolesi.

LILLE.

On May 29, Liszt's interesting work 'Prometheus,' for chorus, orchestra and recitation, was performed for the first time at the Concerts Symphoniques, under the conductorship of Madame Maquet, who on the death of her husband took up his duties.

MUNICH.

Under the auspices of the Münchener Ausstellung, 1910, the Schumann festival took place on May 20-23. The works performed included the Symphonies in B flat and D minor, the Pianoforte concerto (soloist, Herr Wilhelm Backhaus), and the scenes from Byron's 'Manfred.' Many interesting compositions were heard at the Chamber music concerts, among them the A major String quartet, the Pianoforte quartet in E flat, and the beautiful unaccompanied part-songs 'Am Bodensee' and 'Talisman.' Among the artists were Madame Cahier, Herr Alexander Heinemann, and the Petri Quartet. The orchestral concerts were conducted by Herr Ferdinand Löwe.—On June 17 Wagner's very rarely performed early opera 'Die Feen' was revived at the Prinzregenten Theater, under the musical direction of Generalmusikdirektor Felix Mottl.

NÜRNBERG.

Wagner's choral work 'Das Liebesmal der Apostel' and Nicodé's 'Meer Ode' were recently given under the baton of Herr Karl Hirsch.—The Municipal Theatre has also given a series of Maifestspiele, which included performances of Beethoven's 'Fidelio' (conducted by Herr Mottl), Wagner's 'Tristan und Isolde,' and Goldmark's 'Die Königin der Saba.'

PARIS.

Under the management of M. Gabriel Astruc, the Italian Opera Company from the New York Metropolitan Opera House have recently given works from their repertoire at the Chatelet Theatre. At the first performance Verdi's 'Aida' was given under the conductorship of Signor Toscanini, with Mesdames Destinn and Louise Homer and Messrs. Caruso and Amato in the leading parts. Excellent performances of 'Otello' and 'Falstaff' were given with Messrs. Slezak and Scotti in the respective title-roles. Puccini's 'Manon Lescaut' had a great success, largely owing to Signor Caruso's wonderful interpretation of the part of Des Grieux.—On May 28, Massenet's 'Thaïs' was performed for the hundredth time at the Opéra. A few days later, Berlioz's 'La damnation de Faust' (adapted as a five-act opera by Raoul Gunsbourg), was given at the same theatre for the first time.—On May 30, a new three-act opera by Gabriel Pierné, 'On ne badine pas avec l'amour,' was successfully produced at the Opéra-Comique. The libretto is adapted from Alfred de Musset's work of the same name by Messrs. Gabriel Nigond and Louis Leloir. The music is full of delicate and beautiful harmonic and orchestral effects.

TABOR (BOHEMIA).

The Hlahol Singing Club of Tabor celebrated its jubilee on June 25 with a performance of Dvorák's 'The Spectre's Bride.'

TURIN.

Under the auspices of the Associazione dei musicologi, Paisiello's long-forgotten but beautiful opera 'Nina pazzo per amore' has been revived at the Teatro Carignano, one hundred and sixteen years after its original production.

YSTAD (SWEDEN).

The second chamber music festival took place from June 9-11, and was a great success. Three concerts were given. At the first and third, classical works were presented, and the programmes included Mozart's String quintet, Pianoforte trios by Beethoven (Op. 70, No. 2) and Schumann (D minor), and Brahms's beautiful Sextet for strings in B flat major. Swedish music only was heard at the second concert, when Ludwig Norman's String quartet, Wilhelm Stenhammer's Sonata for violin and pianoforte, the Pianoforte trio by Franz Berwald, and songs by Sjögren and Södermann formed an interesting programme. The concerts were all well attended, and among the artists (who gave their services, the proceeds after payment of expenses being devoted to local charities) were Messrs. Wilhelm Stenhammer, Tor Aulin, Franz Neruda, and the excellent amateur vocalist, Herr Salomon Smith, to whose enthusiasm the whole festival was due.

ZÜRICH.

The forty-sixth Tonkünstler-Fest des Allgemeinen Deutschen Musikverein took place from May 27-31. Three orchestral and two chamber music concerts were given. The programme of the first orchestral concert included Arnold Mendelssohn's Overture to 'Pandora,' 'Carnevals-Episode' by Theodor Blumer, the Pianoforte concerto by Hans Huber (excellently played by Herr Rudolph Ganz), and Max Reger's 100th Psalm, for chorus and orchestra. Frederick Delius aroused great interest with his original English Rhapsody 'Brigg Fair' at the second orchestral concert, many critics considering it the most interesting work heard at the festival. At the same concert two original tenor songs with orchestra, 'Der Nachtschwärmer' and 'Sturmabend,' by Siegmund von Hausegger, Béla Bartók's Rhapsody for pianoforte and orchestra, and a Symphony by Karl Weigl were produced. At the third concert, Loeffler's 'Pagan Poem' for orchestra, with pianoforte, horn, and three obligato trumpets, the Violin concerto by Max Schillings (soloist, Herr Felix Berber), and two new choral works, viz., Friedrich Klose's 'Wallfahrt nach Keblvar,' and 'Johannis Offenbarung' (Die vision der sieben Siegel) by Walter Braunfels were heard. The production of String quartets by the Hungarian composer Zoltan Kodaly and by Hermann Suter were interesting features of the chamber music concerts, but the most important new chamber work was Max Reger's Pianoforte quartet, Op. 113, the pianoforte part of which was played by the composer. It was generally agreed that this work constitutes one of Reger's finest achievements. The general conductor of the festival was Herr Volkmar Andrae. It was decided to hold next year's festival at Weimar, to celebrate the centenary of the birth of Franz Liszt.

ZWICKAU.

A Schumann festival has just taken place at this, the composer's native town. On the one hundredth anniversary of his birth (June 8) wreaths and offerings of flowers were laid at the foot of his monument, and the Zwickauer Sängerbund sang two of the master's part-songs. On the evening before, the Berlin musical critic, Herr Fräulein, gave an excellent address on Schumann, and Fräulein Marie Wieck (the composer's sister-in-law, now seventy-eight years old) played some of his pianoforte pieces with wonderful freshness. Fine performances were given of the beautiful choral work, 'Das Paradies und die Peri,' the Overtures to Schiller's 'Braut von Messina' and to 'Genoveva,' and the Concertos for pianoforte and violoncello. Some of the best examples of Schumann's chamber music and many of his most beautiful songs were heard. Among the artists who assisted were the Petri Quartet and Herr Egon Petri (pianoforte).

Country News.

BRIEFLY SUMMARIZED.

We cannot hold ourselves responsible for the opinions expressed in this summary, as the notices are either prepared from local newspapers or furnished by correspondents.

Correspondents are particularly requested to enclose a programme when forwarding reports of concerts.

BEDFORD.—The Musical Society brought its forty-fourth season to a close with two excellent performances of Elgar's 'Dream of Gerontius,' on Wednesday evening, June 15, and Thursday afternoon, June 16, in the Corn Exchange, under the conductorship of Dr. H. A. Harding. The band and chorus numbered 300 performers. The soloists were Miss Phyllis Lett, Mr. Gervase Elwes and Mr. Thorpe Bates. The choir sang with remarkable spirit and intelligence—attack, tone and blend being alike excellent. The orchestra (reinforced by members of the Queen's Hall and London Symphony Orchestras) was most efficient, a notable feature being the delicate and expressive accompaniment to the solos. Mr. A. Parris rendered good service at the organ.

BRUTON.—The Bruton Choral Society held its fifteenth annual concert on June 16. The programme included Cowen's 'John Gilpin,' which was well performed by the chorus and orchestra, and a very fine rendering of Elgar's 'Sea Pictures' was given by Miss Primrose Grey, with orchestral accompaniment. A miscellaneous programme followed, to which the Misses Grey, Mr. D. I. Gass (tenor), Miss Margaret Russell-Baily (violin), and the Rev. E. Capel Cure (violoncello) contributed. Miss Heginbotham was the leader of the orchestra, and Mr. R. T. A. Hughes conducted.

BUILTH WELLS (BRECONSHIRE).—The Philharmonic Society performed Bennett's 'Woman of Samaria' at their concert on June 15. The chorus work was particularly good, and Mr. A. P. Morgan was an able conductor. The soloists were Miss Norah Newport, Miss Katherine Jones, Mr. Walter Glynn and Mr. G. T. Llewellyn. There was an efficient orchestra. The concert concluded with a fine performance of 'The heavens are telling,' from the 'Creation.'

CROWBOROUGH AND JARVIS BROOK.—The final concert of the Musical Society took place on June 8. The chief feature of the programme was Elgar's 'Banner of St. George,' of which an excellent performance was given, reflecting much credit on the conductor, Herr E. Grimm, and the members of the Society. The soloist was Miss Evelyn Vernham.

EASTBOURNE.—The Symphony concerts given on Thursdays by the Duke of Devonshire's Orchestra, conducted by Mr. P. Tas at Devonshire Park, continue their course successfully. On June 9, Brahms's Symphony No. 2, in D major, was the main feature in a programme which included Mendelssohn's 'Calm sea' overture and the symphonic poem 'Le rouet d'Omphale,' by Saint-Saëns, all of which received a highly efficient performance under the able direction of Mr. Tas. On June 16, Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 4, in F minor, was the pièce de résistance, and was excellently interpreted by the orchestra and its skilful conductor.

HARROGATE.—The excellent series of Symphony concerts, conducted by Mr. Julian Clifford at the Kursaal, are the chief musical attractions here. A Schumann Centenary concert was given on June 8, when the Symphony No. 4, in D minor, and Pianoforte concerto in A minor (soloist, Mr. Julian Clifford) were given. On June 15, Schubert's Symphony No. 9, in C, and Glazounov's Violin concerto (soloist, Miss Ivy Angove) were performed. On June 22, Dvorák's Symphony 'From the new world,' Liapounoff's Concerto for pianoforte (solo, Mr. Arthur Newstead) and a new Overture by J. E. Adkins were successfully interpreted. An interesting novelty was introduced on June 16, 17 and 18, when Mr. Charles Fry recited, with orchestral accompaniment, 'King Robert of Sicily,' music by John E. West, the 'Building of Sans Sofia,' music by H. M. Higgs, a scene from Schumann's 'Manfred,' and other pieces, with music, which were much appreciated. Congratulations are due to Mr. Julian Clifford for his zealous efforts on behalf of good music in this locality, and for the able manner in which he directs his excellent orchestra.

NORWICH.—The Norwich Orchestral Union, conducted by Mr. Ernest Harcourt, gave a successful concert at the School of Music on June 10, when the programme included Mozart's motet 'Splendente Te, Deus,' the 'Ballet des Sylphes' from Berlioz's 'Faust' and Sir Frederick Bridge's 'Ballad of the Clampheddown.' The solo vocalists were Miss May Stowers and Mr. G. Heckford, and Miss Nellie Emms recited 'The feast of Madain,' by Katharine Parr, which had been set to orchestral accompaniment by Mr. Harcourt.

TUNBRIDGE WELLS.—An 'In Memoriam' concert was given on May 25, in the Great Hall, by Mr. Francis J. Foote's choir and orchestra, numbering nearly 200 performers. Verdi's 'Requiem' was performed with remarkable power. The orchestra of fifty performers was composed entirely of leading professional players. The soloists were Miss Ethel Wood, Miss Marie Wadia, Mr. Cynlais Gibbs and Mr. Percival Driver. Mr. Francis J. Foote conducted.

At the Special Congregation for conferring Honorary Degrees held at Cambridge on Tuesday, June 14, Sir Walter Parratt, M.V.O., Honorary Fellow of Magdalen College, and Professor of Music in the University of Oxford, was presented by the Public Orator, Dr. Sandys, for the degree of Doctor of Music, honoris causa. Sir Walter was introduced as a native of Yorkshire, who had had an hereditary claim to distinction as an organist. Thirty-eight years ago he had been called to the College of St. Mary Magdalen in the University of Oxford. Ten years later he had been transferred to St. George's Chapel, Windsor, and, at the end of another period of ten years, he had been knighted by Queen Victoria. To Her Majesty's Royal successors he had been a persona grata, owing to his exquisite skill in that art of Music, which is one of the best interpreters of the joys and sorrows of kings and of their subjects. He was well known as the author of the beautiful anthem on 'Life and Death,' and also as the composer of the severe and simple music for the celebrated performance of the 'Agamemnon' of Æschylus at Oxford and elsewhere thirty years ago. Finally, he had long been distinguished for his marvellous musical memory. The Greeks had said that the Muses were the daughters of Memory; but Sir Walter Parratt had proved that Memory was also the mother of Music.

The thirty-third annual report and balance sheet of the York Musical Society has been issued. Three concerts were given, in October, December and March. At the first the music written by the honorary conductor, Mr. T. Tertius Noble, for the York Historic Pageant, was repeated in concert-form with great success. At the second a miscellaneous programme was given. At the third 'The Dream of Gerontius' was performed. An improvement in the financial position of the Society was achieved principally by means of the October concert. Among those to whom the President, Mr. Arthur P. Purey-Cust, expresses the indebtedness of the Society, are Miss Argles, who annotated the programmes; Mr. R. S. Rose, the honorary assistant-conductor; Mr. H. S. Wilkinson, accompanist; the Rev. G. H. Stock and Mrs. Richard Lawson. The secretaries are Messrs. G. W. Daniel and W. P. Saville.

During the month of May, Mr. Sergius Kussewitsky made a tour through the interior of Russia with the orchestra of the Moscow Imperial Opera. His object was to give symphony concerts in places where such concerts were practically unknown, and to further the appreciation of high-class music. To this end he hired a large river steamer, and with a few guests and the orchestra sailed along the Volga, stopping at suitable towns. Concerts were given at Twer, Rybinsk, Jaroslavl, Kostrama, Nijni-Novgorod, Kasan, Samara, Saratoff, and Astrachan. Scriabine was the solo pianist. The scheme was very successful, but difficulties sometimes arose with regard to the concert hall. Next year M. Kussewitsky intends to remedy this by building a special floating concert hall, to be towed by the steamer.

Excellent work is being done by Mr. Charles Hoby, Bandmaster of the Royal Marines, Chatham Division. During the season he gave three symphony concerts at Chatham Town Hall, with programmes of great interest and artistic value. The symphonies performed were Tchaikovsky's fourth (two movements), Haydn's in C (Salomon series), and Schubert's sixth. The list of other orchestral works performed, included the names of Mozart, Jarnefelt, Sibelius, German, Grieg, Schubert, Elgar, Dvorák, Mendelssohn, Stanford, C. Victor Hely-Hutchinson, and Mr. Hoby.

The prospectus of the new Birmingham Philharmonic Society has been issued. The object announced is to place orchestral music in Birmingham on a permanent footing and to develop local resources. An orchestra of eighty performers, selected from the best available players in the district and supplemented by principals from London and elsewhere has been formed. Eight concerts are announced for the next season. For these the following conductors have been engaged: Mr. Landon Ronald, Mr. George Henschel, M. Wassili Safonoff (2), Mr. Henry J. Wood (2), Mr. Thomas Beecham, and Herr Fritz Cassirer.

Favourable reports come to hand of the concert-tour in South Africa now being carried out by the 'Triumviri', whose other names are Charles Saunders, Charles Knowles and Percival Garratt. The famous tenor and baritone singers need no introduction. Mr. Garratt is a young pianist from Oxford, whose gifts include a productive vein of composition. Incidentally, we hear of a lady who was convinced that Triumviri was an Italian composer whose works the three gentlemen were performing!

The following Scholarships have recently been awarded at the Royal Academy of Music: The Sterndale Bennett Scholarship (for any branch of music) to Arthur Alexander, of Dunedin, New Zealand (Pianoforte and Composition). The Thalberg Scholarship (Pianoforte), to Catherine Muriel Mann, of Sheffield. The Charles Rube Prize (Ensemble-playing), to Edwin Quaife, Willie Davies, Phyllis J. Mitchell and Benno J. Pitt.

At the Hampstead Conservatoire on June 22, Sir Frederick Bridge directed a concert performance of Milton's 'Masque of Comus' with the music by Lawes and others, which he has adapted to that work. The solo parts were sung by Miss Oswyn Jones and Mr. Graham Smart, and Mrs. Calverley Bewicke recited selections from the poem.

The London Musical Festival announced by the directors of the Queen's Hall Orchestra to be held during the spring of next year, has now been definitely fixed for the week, May 22 to 27, 1911, inclusive.

As a token of the regard felt for Mr. Alexander Morgan by his friends and pupils at the Sigdon Road and Millfields Road vocal classes, a chased silver-mounted baton and a brass music-stand were presented to him on May 25. The presentation, which took place at Millfields Road Council School, was made by Miss Webb.

June 9 was the hundredth anniversary of the birth of Otto Nicolai, the composer of 'The Merry Wives of Windsor.' He died in Berlin on March 9, 1849, two-months after the successful production of the above-mentioned work.

Owing to an attack of neuritis in his right arm, Paderewski was unable to give the pianoforte recital at the Queen's Hall announced for June 22.

Answers to Correspondents.

G. F. B. (a) asks whether any reader can supply the Musical Times for June, 1890 (out of print). (b) Summational tones are resultant tones found by the sum of the numbers of two previous tones; given vibrations at the rate of 100 and 130, the summation tone will be the pitch represented by 230 vibrations. Differential tones similarly are resultants, represented by the vibrational difference of two pitches. In the above case the differential would be the pitch represented by 30 vibrations. See Helmholtz on Sound for a full discussion of this subject.

AMBITIOUS.—We cannot tell you how to obtain a post in a professional church choir except by your advertising and otherwise making known your desires, and, it may be added, proving your competence. We are sorry to confess that we do not know anything of the 'Phone Fiddle,' or of a pamphlet on 'Trick playing.'

L. E. COURTNAY.—(1) Tchaikovsky's fourth Symphony arranged for pianoforte solo is published by Jurgerson, of Moscow, and can be obtained at Novello's, price 7s. 6d. net. (2) We are sorry we do not know of such a work.

CADER.—You appear to have been badly treated; but there was apparently no contract to do more than teach you. We cannot recommend individual teachers. You had better write to one of the professors of the great schools of music to hear you professionally.

A. J. STEVENSON.—No mechanical combination of violin and pianoforte has come under our notice. Probably this is because such a contrivance is obviously impossible so far as the violin is concerned.

E. RUSSELL.—Much may be accomplished by a school choir working forty-five minutes a week. The results would, of course, depend upon the capacity of the children and the skill of the teacher.

STANLEY A. KING.—We know of no biographical sketch of Emile Waldeufel beyond the brief note in Riemann's Dictionary (German edition) and that in Grove's Dictionary.

H. C. W. A.—Melodious Technique, Books I. and II., by J. A. O'Neill (Novello & Co.), will no doubt suit your purpose.

ENDYMION'S DREAM

CANTATA

FOR SOPRANO AND TENOR SOLI, CHORUS AND ORCHESTRA

THE WORDS BY

C. R. B. BARRETT

THE MUSIC BY

S. COLERIDGE-TAYLOR.

Price One Shilling and Sixpence.

DAILY TELEGRAPH.

A short cantata, this, which occupies little more than half-an-hour in performance, it is likely to become popular on account of the pleasant nature of its music, even though a good deal more use might be, and perhaps should have been, made of the chorus. But not since, in his student days, Mr. Coleridge-Taylor evolved the opening part of his "Hiawatha" trilogy, has he composed music that seemed so grateful and so inevitable. . . . There are in the score many pages in which the composer's own individuality appears unmistakably, and his is a decidedly interesting individuality. This, combined with the picturesqueness of the music, the dramatic nature of the "book," and the comparative freedom of the score from ultra-modern difficulties, should enable the cantata to find many a hearing, more especially in choirs and places where the pitch is not so high as in use at Brighton.

MORNING POST.

His music shows no decrease in choral effect, and this remains the composer's strong point and the outstanding feature of the work. . . . Mr. Coleridge-Taylor is to be commended for his appreciation of the design best suited to the theme of the union of Sun and Moon. His eloquence of musical utterance, his command of orchestral colour, and his grasp of fundamental principles of choral writing are present throughout.

STANDARD.

Seldom has so much urgent music—music that breathes and reeks of romance and passion in almost every bar—been compressed into so small a compass. At a time when the future of English opera is upon every one's lips it is encouraging to meet with a work that reveals a sense of the theatre so unmistakably as does Mr. Coleridge-Taylor's so-called cantata. The composer employs the representative theme, but he employs it with discretion, and the orchestral writing throughout is both free and unfettered. Notwithstanding that the passion is nothing if not cumulative, the skill with which he avoids an anti-climax is remarkable. A delightfully atmospheric chorus of stars—constellations—founded on a descending chromatic figure, leads to Selene's solo, which contains some of the most beautiful music in the work; indeed, throughout the vocal writing is of an unusually grateful nature. Moreover, Mr. Coleridge-Taylor's stock of orchestral device and colour is unfailing.

PALL MALL GAZETTE.

Words which Mr. Coleridge-Taylor has wedded to appropriate and delightful music. . . . The work will undoubtedly add to Mr. Coleridge-Taylor's laurels.

MANCHESTER GUARDIAN.

The new cantata will not improbably rank high among the composer's works, for it seems to mark a distinct advance in his musical individuality. . . . The themes are in themselves striking and dramatically expressive. . . . He is more terse, more concentrated, and just as picturesque as ever, and he reveals almost unsuspected dramatic power.

OBSERVER.

It is the most vital work he has written for a long time. He has not since his early days so well resisted the temptation to set down superfluous things just because they come easily to him, and this is only another way of saying that it is conciser and better balanced than anything he has composed for a long time. It also shows a finer sense of climax and of dramatic music as distinct from that which is merely superficially picturesque.

ATHENÆUM.

Mr. S. Coleridge-Taylor's "Endymion's Dream," a cantata of modest proportions, but one of which the freshness and rhythmic life, and the dramatic and poetical character of the music, recall the composer's "Hiawatha."

WORLD.

Coleridge-Taylor's "Dream of Endymion" is likely to rank as his best work since "Hiawatha," for it is stronger and terser, and gives proof of greater intellectuality without loss of the qualities of sensuous charm which always distinguishes Mr. Coleridge-Taylor, even when he is least his best self.

SET TO MUSIC BY

JOHN MERBECKE

(A.D. 1550).

EDITED, WITH AN ACCOMPANIMENT FOR ORGAN

BY

BASIL HARWOOD.

This edition of Merbecke's Communion Service is based on Rimbault's reprint of 1871, after a careful comparison with a copy of the original edition of 1550 belonging to the Library of Christ Church, Oxford. The Plain Song is presented as nearly as possible in the form in which it first appeared, only such changes having been introduced as are required by the altered wording of our Prayer Book.

PRICE SIXPENCE.

Vicar, Cornwall.—"The combined choirs, with organ and full orchestra, performed 'The Rolling Seasons' before crowded congregations, and the effect was really grand, and highly appreciated by all."
Organist, Sydney, New South Wales.—"Your Anthems are just the identical compositions for ordinary Church choirs, not too difficult, very taking and effective. I admire them intensely, and recommend them wherever I go. We are just getting 24 copies each of twenty of your Anthems."

From one of the largest Publishing Firms in America—"Everything from your small anthems to a highly appreciated by all."
Organist, Derbyshire.—"All the Churches in this neighbourhood put on as a rule some Anthem of yours. It speaks well for the popularity of your music."

CHOIRMASTERS (giving Name of Church) can have FREE SPECIMENS of any Three of the following Anthems or Services from the Composer (CALEB SIMPER, 41 Kilbirnie, Barnstable).

COMPOSER'S MS.

EXTRACTS FROM PREFACE.

My guiding principle has been to place before the reader the facts collected by me as well as the conclusions at which I arrived. This will enable him to see the subject in all its bearings, with all its pros and cons, and to draw his own conclusions, should mine not obtain his approval.

My researches had for their object the whole life of Chopin and his historical, political, artistical, social, and personal surroundings, but they were chiefly directed to the least known and most interesting period of his career—his life in France, and his visits to Germany and Great Britain.

600 QUESTIONS WITH ANSWERS

BY

ERNEST A. DICKS,

Fellow of the Royal College of Organists.

PREFACE TO THE SEVENTH EDITION.

Through the kindness of Dr. E. H. Turpin the seventh edition of the Handbook of Examinations in Music includes the latest type of Papers set by Trinity College of Music, London, in their scheme of Local Examinations in Musical Knowledge.

The work will also be found to have been considerably enlarged by the addition of fifty specimen questions, with answers. They have been designed for the most part after the manner of those set in the Theory Paper for the L.R.A.M. Diploma, and also that required by candidates for the Higher Practical Examinations held by Trinity College of Music, London. The author earnestly hopes that these additions will considerably enhance the value of the Handbook, and render it increasingly helpful to students.

TECHNIQUE

AND EXPRESSION

PIANOFORTE PLAYING

BY

FRANKLIN TAYLOR.

EXTRACT FROM PREFACE.

In the course of my experience as a teacher of the pianoforte, an experience extending over many years, certain ideas have from time to time suggested themselves to me which have proved useful—to myself, as enabling me to express more clearly that which I desired my pupils to understand, and to my pupils, as tending to facilitate their comprehension of the various difficulties they have had to encounter, at the same time leading them to perceive the most practical means of overcoming them, and thus accelerating their general rate of progress.

These suggestions relate to both the mechanical and intellectual sides of the study of pianoforte-playing, or, briefly, to Technique and Expression, the chief matters implied by the first of these terms being the production of various qualities of tone, the choice of suitable fingering, and the best methods of attacking certain difficulties; while the second, which may perhaps be more aptly designated the means of expression, includes rhythm, phrasing, variety and gradation of tone, the use of the pedals, et cætera.

These Pianoforte Studies have been highly praised by M. VLADIMIR DE PACHMANN, who has expressed his intention of playing some of them during his Recital Tour in the United States. His testimonial is published with the Work, which consists of Twelve Numbers, specially designed to develop power and skill in the fourth and fifth fingers. The importance of trying to equalize these weaker fingers with the stronger ones is unquestionable, as defective execution is more often traceable to this inequality of the fingers than to any other cause.

A Modern School for the Violin

BY

AUGUST WILHELMJ AND JAMES BROWN.

THE purpose of this Work is to provide, in one systematic and comprehensive scheme, all that is necessary for the acquirement of the Art of Modern Violin Playing.

"A Modern School for the Violin" consists of Six Books devoted to Daily Technical Practice, Six Books of Studies for Violin alone, and a large number of Pieces with Pianoforte Accompaniment, the Violin parts being specially edited for the purposes of teaching.

SECTION A.—TECHNICAL PRACTICE. IN SIX BOOKS.

The foundation of "A Modern School for the Violin" is laid by means of a series of Six Books dealing exclusively with the important subject of DAILY TECHNICAL PRACTICE. The First Book of Technical Practice (Book 1A) is limited to the 1st Position; the Second Book (2A) to the 1st, 2nd, and 3rd Positions; the Third Book (3A) to the first five Positions; and so on. Bowings and other technical devices are introduced in a similarly progressive manner throughout. Each Book of Technical Practice is divided into "Lessons" (or Chapters), and each Lesson contains a number of short repeating Exercises on some definite point of Violin Technique—as Fingering, Bowing, &c., with the needful explanations. Included in each Book will be found a complete set of Scales and Arpeggi, arranged according to the particular stage of advancement reached.

Taken as a whole, this section is intended to facilitate, and to insist on, a thorough, steady, and continuous progress in the mastery of the Instrument, this being the only possible means of preparing the groundwork for artistic achievement with all its lasting delights.

SECTION B.—STUDIES. IN SIX BOOKS.

Section B is formed of a series of original and selected Studies, in Six Books. Each Book of Studies (Section B) is carefully co-ordinated, in respect of difficulty and range of subject, with the correspondingly numbered Book of Technical Practice (Section A). Thus the First Book of Studies (1B) is written in the 1st Position; the Second Book (2B) in the 1st, 2nd, and 3rd Positions; the 3rd Book (3B) in all Positions up to and including the 5th; and so on. It should further be explained that the two Sections are designed to complement one another, and that the "School" must be practised, not in single Books of Technical Practice and Studies alternately, but in pairs. Thus, Books 1A and 1B are to be taken concurrently, then Books 2A and 2B, 3A and 3B, and so on, and the appropriate pairs are now issued bound together in cloth (see Cloth Bindings below).

1A. TECHNICAL PRACTICE (1st Position)	2s. 6d.	1B. STUDIES (1st Position)	2s. 6d.
2A. DITTO (1st, 2nd, and 3rd Positions)	2s. 6d.	2B. DITTO (1st, 2nd, and 3rd Positions)	2s. 6d.
3A. DITTO ... (1st to 5th Position)	3s. 6d.	3B. DITTO ... (1st to 5th Position)	3s. 6d.
4A. DITTO ... (all Positions)	2s. 6d.	4B. DITTO ... (all Positions)	3s. 6d.
5A. DITTO ... Do.	2s. 6d.	5B. DITTO ... Do.	3s. 6d.
6A. DITTO ... Do.	3s. 6d.	6B. DITTO ... Do.	3s. 6d.

THE ASSOCIATION OF MUSICAL COMPETITION FESTIVALS.

As notified in our May issue, the above Association will hold its sixth annual conference at Messrs. Broadwood's, Conduit Street, on Thursday, July 14, at 10.45 a.m. Lady Mary Trefusis will take the chair.

The following papers will be read (morning session):

'Choral Training,' Mr. R. W. Wilson (Manchester).

'Expression,' Mr. Walter Ford.

'The Competition of Church Choirs,' the Rev. A. Commeline.

Afternoon session, 2.45 to 4.30 p.m.

'The Training of Boys' Voices in Church Choirs,' Dr. Varley Roberts, Magdalen College, Oxford.

'The Cultivation of Vocal Tone' (with illustrations by a small class), Dr. H. Hulbert.

'The Dorset Choral Association,' Miss F. Kindersley.

A meeting of the delegates forming the Council will be held on Wednesday, July 13, at 11 a.m.

Anyone can join the Association on payment of 2s. 6d. per annum. Membership entitles to admission to the conference. The hon. secs. are Miss Wakefield and Dr. W. G. McNaught. All communications should be addressed to the acting secretary, Miss E. Maddock, 22, Addison Court Gardens, London, W.

COMBINED PERFORMANCE OF MUSIC AT COMPETITION FESTIVALS.

The discussion on this topic that appeared in our last issue, in which the Rev. Canon Gorton, Mr. Herbert Thompson, and Mr. Ivor Atkins took part, has excited widespread interest. The Manchester Guardian, in a leading article headed 'Musical Festival Policy,' says:

The [Morecambe] festival has provoked a renewal of a critical debate on the music of the competitive festivals generally. For the present the competitive festival movement, although still spreading rapidly, can hardly be said to be developing. While there is much fine singing at the festivals, the amount of great music given at them all put together is not large. On this account, no doubt, Mr. Ivor Atkins, speaking last year, ventured to deplore the lack of large-scale compositions at the festival. In his preface to the programme of this year's festival, Canon Gorton replies that the essence of real greatness may be found even in the smaller works of the greatest composers, and that something like perfection of performance, which could not be obtained in large-scale works at such places as Morecambe, is necessary for the revelation of what is beautiful. The Musical Times in its notice, and Mr. Atkins in a letter, maintain again that the important thing, even more in country districts than in other places, is to familiarise people with the great masterpieces of music, and that perfection of choral technique is a secondary matter which at these festivals is too apt to be followed for its own sake.

There is much truth on both sides of this argument, but not the whole truth on either. Canon Gorton, it is well to remember, has been found in some very enthusiastic moments to be at heart on the side of his critics. It is not many years since he rejoiced at the prospect of having the 'Dream of Gerontius' at the Morecambe festival. And we may venture to think that if it had been possible for Canon Gorton to have continued unabated his own active support of the festival, that prospect would by now have been fulfilled, and neither would Mr. Atkins's criticism have been offered nor Canon Gorton's defence been ever thought of. But those who advocate larger works should be careful how far they advocate easy standards of performance. Those who live in the big music centres know too well how uninspiring the greatest work can be if there is not at least the spirit of perfection in the giving of it. They know also how rarely in these centres anything like fine performances of the smaller choral works can be heard. And they know the excessive conservatism which comes from a too great awe of great works and of the past altogether, as well as the frivolous impatience with the beautiful in the smaller forms of music. It is to get away from these things that the weariest critic in our large towns gladly makes a pilgrimage to Morecambe, where he can hear the smaller works given with due feeling for their perfectness and beauty, and where the new composer, if he is not heard in his greatest work, is at least not denied a hearing altogether.

A CHORALIST'S VIEW.

A Lancashire correspondent writes:—Messrs. Ivor Atkins and Herbert Thompson have dealt with this subject from the point of view of conductor and critic; may I record a few thoughts as a choir singer who has taken part in Lancashire combined performances and heard many more? The question of massed performances by numerous competing choirs is one of the knotty problems, at any rate in the North. I cannot agree with Mr. Thompson's statement 'that perfection of execution, however desirable, is after all of less importance than spreading a familiarity with the greatest efforts of the masters,' or of that by Mr. Atkins, 'that the spread of musical knowledge is of far greater importance than choral technique per se, important as this is.'

It should not be forgotten that the method of spreading this musical knowledge which has been deliberately chosen is through the medium of choral music, and unless the highest degree of efficiency is ever kept in view, how is the art going to make the desired progress? In some districts it is notorious that excessive zeal for purely competitive singing has frustrated attempts at high-class performances of choral works on the larger scale, and this is greatly to be deplored. Combined performances by visiting competitive choirs have in the past proved a fiasco at both Morecambe and Blackpool because of inadequate opportunities for joint rehearsals as one large unit, and the promoters withdrew them rather than submit a performance which they knew would fall short of the high standard prevailing in competitive work. Mr. Ivor Atkins, in company with others, would appear to have fallen a victim to the fallacy that madrigal and part-song work is rather a waste of time unless it lead up to a familiarity with what he calls 'the great music of the earth.' But will he or anybody else seriously argue that Brahms's 'Requiem' is more perfect art than, say, 'Fest- und Gedenksprüche,' or 'Night watch,' or 'In autumn' of the same composer? Will he contend that Elgar's 'O wild west wind' or 'There is sweet music' is inferior as choral writing to that in 'The Kingdom' or 'The Apostles'? As well say that string quartet music is inferior to orchestral music. The truth is that a comparison of this nature is neither possible nor desirable; that each form occupies an honourable position in the palace of musical art, and perfection in the lowlier and more intimate form of chamber music, be it instrumental or vocal, is to be prized as much as in the more massive forms. If you can encourage both sides of choral art side by side, always maintaining the highest standard of efficiency (as has been acknowledged to be the case, say, at Blackpool in the last two years), so much the better; but if not, surely it were better to leave out the bigger works, rather than debase the standard which we know ought to be attained, until circumstances permit such a consummation. Better have miniatures perfectly rendered than the 'great masters' inadequately interpreted. The high quality of performances at competition festivals is inevitably reacting on the larger choral bodies. In Liverpool and in North Staffordshire will be found large choirs preparing their big works with the same assiduous care that they would bestow on a competition piece. Why? Because their conductors have a higher standard of excellence which they have learned in competitive work. In at least one big Lancashire centre there is a growing dissatisfaction (amongst people who are not content to take merely perfunctory views on musical art) with the relatively feeble preparation of the big choral works. Bach performances have been heard, of which competitive choirs of any standing would have been ashamed—due, no doubt, to insufficient rehearsal; but now people are beginning to ask why the greater masterworks should not be prepared with the same thoroughness which is displayed by those bodies of singers working on the lowlier plane of choral miniatures; if works in this form of art by Brahms, Cornelius, Elgar, Bantock, and the rest, are worth all the rehearsal which they undoubtedly receive, then how much more so the monumental creations! The more the musical public becomes familiarised with the high standard of performances by the best of the choirs who have gained distinction in the competition arena, the more will it insist on the same excellence from the bigger choirs, and the demand will grow more insistent every year.

MR. J. C. CLARKE (SOUTHPORT) ON THE COMPETITION MOVEMENT.

The well-known choir-trainer and organist of Southport read a paper recently on 'The competitive musical festival movement' before the West Lancashire section of the Incorporated Society of Musicians. The following are extracts:

WHAT THE FESTIVALS HAVE DONE.

What have these musical competitions accomplished? First of all they have brought into life choirs which otherwise would never have existed. They have been the means of giving us some fine and beautiful part-music, specially written for the festival, by such men as Elgar, Bantock and others. To Morecambe and Blackpool we are particularly indebted for so many of these original contributions. This is a valuable asset, and it should be encouraged and cultivated at all our festivals. It is not only an advantage for our singers to have original and up-to-date music, but at the same time it tends to bring out our young composers, many of whom find a difficulty in getting their music published, let alone heard. We have heard compositions by Brahms, Strauss, Elgar, Cornelius and others, which, but for the competitions, might still be on the shelf; and so, if for no other reasons than these, the competitions have justified and earned their existence. The many details and artistic touches of light and shade, the study of enunciation and intonation, necessarily practised over and over again for a contest, have been the means of equipping singers for other choral bodies and choirs in the town, and have been the means of materially assisting and helping other conductors and choirmasters, either directly or indirectly; whilst many chorists, to my knowledge, have obtained remunerative posts through the experience gained with competitive choirs. Personally, I should like to see more music of the dramatic type selected. In my experience I have found that this is the least understood and interpreted.

LATITUDE IN INTERPRETATION.

Conductors should be allowed more latitude in competitions. Often there is too much restraint and not sufficient individuality shown, which makes the performance too perfunctory, mechanical, and automatic. There is too much adherence to tempo, metronome marks, &c., which is not always conducive to the best and most successful interpretations. Dr. Walford Davies once told me that he thought conductors should give their own interpretation, at even the risk of losing a prize. I have known one or two notable instances of choirs losing a prize through following the exact metronome mark, which in some cases has been quite inaccurate. I often think that the study of rhythm is too sadly neglected. In much of the singing we hear, it is most difficult to tell which is the first of the bar through want of accent, or the misplacing of accent. My recommendation is, 'Study the words, and you will soon find the accent.' Then much has yet to be done in the clear articulation of consonants and preservation of vowels; and also less forcing of the voice in crescendos and fortes; and some reserve of voice in fortissimo passages.

COMBINED PERFORMANCES.

Too little time has been allowed for combined performances or festival concerts, which, to my thinking, should be the culminating point of all these competitive musical festivals. In this respect the Kendal Musical Festival is the model, for there we have the combination of competition and festival in its highest form. Miss Wakefield says: 'There is a feeling in existence that competitions and festivals do not answer together. I disagree with this, and should never care to be mixed up with merely a competition.' Those agreeing with it say, 'You lose in the festival all the funds you make over competitions, and they cannot be worked together.' I hold, on the contrary, that they can, and that the competitions lose their chief interest and their binding, enduring power when the festival is not the most important part of the undertaking.

THE AIM.

Let me say once more that if this movement is to last, our aims must be high. We must only have the highest and most beautiful music performed; nothing that merely tickles the musical palate of the masses. Our work must be for art and not for glory. As Dr. McNaught once said: 'It should be a "school of music, and not a school of glory."' We must remember that music is a Divine gift and inheritance given to us, not for sordid purposes, but for the perfecting of our minds and souls.

A SUMMARY OF AN ADJUDICATOR'S TOUR.

I.—WORCESTER.

May 10, 11, 12.

This competition was held under depressing circumstances. The recent death of the King naturally occupied attention and dulled interest. After consultation with local and official authorities it was deemed best to persevere with the competitions and to abandon the projected concerts. As combined performance is a strong feature of the festival and much trouble and expense had been incurred, the music prepared for the concerts was given at a kind of public rehearsal.

The various classes covered a wide field including, as they did, pianoforte quintets, string quartets, junior and senior choirs of all kinds and grades, sight-playing and sight-singing and the composition of a song. An excellent performance of Dohnányi's Quintet (Op. 1) was given by the party led by Mrs. C. Johnson. Only this one of the two entries appeared. The quartet parties played Haydn's quartet (Op. 76, No. 1), the prize falling to the players led by Mrs. Alan Dickens. A section for girls' and women's clubs, the tests for which were 'Twelve by the clock' (Lloyd) and 'Harbour Song' (Percy Buck) brought forward three well-trained classes, the St. John's Club, Kidderminster (Miss Gertrude Larr) gaining the victory.

The Stourbridge Institute male-voice choir (Mr. Henry Woodall) gave absolutely first-rate interpretations of 'Every rustling tree' (Kuhlan), 'The Beleaguered' (Sullivan), and more especially 'The Reveille' (Elgar). I have heard many of the finest choirs in England and Wales sing this magnificent piece, and have rarely heard it better done than it was on this occasion. This choir should certainly measure itself with some of the well-known northern choirs. Their voices are fine, their musicianship excellent—or Elgar's 'Reveille' would be otherwise impossible to them—and, above all, they are led by a man who knows what interpretation means.

The district is strong in female-voice choirs. Five excellently equipped bodies sang 'A Farewell' (Buck) and 'At night' (Herman), Miss Winifred Kingsford's Moseley choir gaining the first position.

An interesting feature of the second day's proceedings was the public performance of the songs sent in for the composition prize. One or two poems given in the schedule had to be set. None of the songs achieved much distinction, but those by Mr. P. Allchurch and Miss Winifred Taylor were the most interesting and they were bracketed first. Mr. Ivor Atkins adjudicated in this class, and gave an able analysis of each of the songs presented. Mixed-voice and male-voice quartets were well in evidence, and a class of factory girls, the Cinderella Choral Society (Mr. Vere Gladwell) made a very good appearance. Six church choirs sang, with the result that St. Agnes's, King's Norton (Mr. A. Walker) was first in one section, and Arley (Miss Mary Woodward) in another. In the small village choir section, in which four choirs sang, Whittington (Mr. Barry) was first.

The last day was the most important of the three. Ten village choirs for female voices came, of the eleven that had entered. The tests were 'Night' (Heale), and 'O swallow' (G. von Holst). Colwall (Miss Chorles) came cut first, and Tardbigge (Miss Barbara Dickens), second. The others were not far behind. It was evident that this section was a very useful one. In the mixed-voice village choir section there were seven choirs, and the test-pieces were 'Come, sleep' (C. Wood), and 'Phœbe' (Stanford). Hartlebury (Mr. R. A. Taylor) was victorious, and Colwall (Miss Chorles) was only one mark behind. Hagley (Mr. G. H. Weddall), and Tardbigge (Miss B. Dickens) followed very close. A banner was won by Tardbigge for its achievements in several classes.

Some fine choral performances were heard in the classes for town, choral societies and open mixed-voice choirs. Only two choirs came, those from Stourport (Mr. Jackson) and Moseley (Mr. W. Kingsford), Worcester itself not contributing a choir. The tests were: 'Winter days' (Caldicott) and 'Bright is the ring of words' (Colin Taylor). In the first of these two classes Stourport gained 147 marks (out of 160) and Moseley 132. In the open class, in which the test was 'My love dwelt in a northern land' (Elgar), Moseley—the only entry—gained 69 marks out of a possible 80.

On the whole it was obvious that in the district appealed to there is plenty of natural capacity and many skilful conductors.

The works for combined performance were 'The Banner of St. George' (Elgar) and 'A Song of Victory' (Hiller). A full orchestra containing many professional players assisted. It was evident that the singers enjoyed the massiveness and breadth of the combination. The tone was often very fine. The attack suffered from lack of sufficient rehearsal, but nevertheless both works were impressively sung. Madame Alice Phillips and Mrs. Glover Eaton were the soloists, and Mr. Ivor A. Atkins was in his element as conductor.

The critic of the Birmingham Daily Post made the following interesting remarks on some of the choral performances:

'The evening was entirely given up to male choral and quartet singing. None of it fell below the level of the respectable; most of it was very good, and in two instances it was magnificent. The one defect that ran through almost all of it was that so often observable in choral singing that is earnest rather than inspired—a tendency to work too obviously in black and white, and to fly at every mark of expression—piano, forte, staccato, crescendo, or whatever it may be—take it by the throat and shake the life out of it. It is what the old school used to call "singing with plenty of light and shade." It would be more correctly called making us unable to see the wood for the trees. Nothing is easier than to get "light and shade," and no effect in choral singing can be cruder. This incessant switching the light on and off worries us in the end like the pranks of a child playing with an electric light button. We are groping one minute and blinded the next. Choral singing becomes artistic only when it progresses from the system of sharply contrasted black and white to the system of colour laid on in washes, with each tint shading into the next, except when abrupt contrast is the essence of the effect. The present faults of most of the choirs we heard to-night come from their being too intent on the merely musical side of the performance, and too oblivious of the poetical side of it. Dr. McNaught did quite right to take some of the poetical lines by themselves without the music, and parody the choirs' phrasing and interpretation of them. One always wishes on these occasions that the needed lesson could be given on the allopathic principle of a disease being cured by its opposite. If a Wullner, for example, could sing a few songs in the hearing of the various choirs, and show them what effect can be made by an artist with hardly any voice, but with the power of getting inside the words and the spirit of the music, it would be the best corrective of this passion for dwelling too exclusively on the external minutiae. One choir, however, gave us a rare treat: the Stourbridge Institute Male-Voice Choir, which was without competitors both in the class for workmen's clubs and in the open competitions for male-voice choirs. I have never heard it or even heard of it before, but if it can sing on ordinary occasions as splendidly as it did to-night, it would give the best of the crack northern choirs a shaking. The vocal material is excellent; the musicianship of the choir, as shown in its handling of Elgar's difficult 'The Reveille,' is unusually sound; and its conductor, Mr. Henry Woodall, is evidently a choir-trainer of exceptional abilities. The performances of the choir fully deserved the warm eulogy that Dr. McNaught gave them.'

II.—KENT FESTIVAL.

CHATHAM, May 25.

This is a movable event. Last year it was held at Dover. There were a fair number of entries spread over numerous classes. In the chief choral class, the tests for which were 'Weary wind of the West' (Elgar), 'All creatures now are merry minded' (Benet), and a sight-singing test, the Canterbury Choral Society (Dr. C. Charlton Palmer) was first and Sheerness Co-operative Choral Society (Mr. S. Quint) second. Two village orchestras played some simple music acceptably; village choirs sang 'Morning Song' (Brahms) and 'He that hath a pleasant face' (Hatton), and Wateringbury (Mr. Edgar A. Smith) came first. Four very good female-voice choirs sang 'How merrily we live' (Este) and 'In the dell and dingle' (Benet). The Girls' Grammar School, Maidstone, sang remarkably well and were placed first. There were besides classes for vocal duets and quartets that supplied interest and variety. The audiences were fairly large, and the proceedings generally were evidently interesting alike to performers and listeners.

III.—TRURO.

CORNWALL COUNTY COMPETITION.—May 9, 10, 11.

When Lady Mary Trefusis, the chairman of the Committee of the Association of Competition Festivals, a few years ago fixed her home near Truro, it was easy to prophesy that it would not be long before an effort would be made to establish a competition festival in Cornwall. The happy fulfilment of the prophecy has now to be recorded. After gathering an influential committee and holding public and many private meetings, the first festival was held at Truro on the above-named dates with conspicuous and highly gratifying success. Here and there one heard of aloofness arising mainly from doubts as to what it all meant, but generally the support was cordial.

There were four instrumental classes (village bands, trios, and two sets of small orchestras), and twenty choral classes. No soloists were catered for, and no money prizes were offered. There were one hundred entries, but not all appeared; an alteration of dates and some illness kept some away. Dr. H. P. Allen adjudicated on the first two days, and dealt with all the adult sections. I heard only the juniors on the third day. The school entries were very satisfactory and seemed to show that Cornwall school teachers are not afraid of being beaten by their comrades in work. In one class there were eight school entries, in another thirteen, and in still another five, all from different schools. The concert hall presented an exhilarating scene the whole day, and the interest shown was very keen.

The singing generally left no doubt as to the natural musical capacity of the children. As for tone, the power exhibited was to me exceptional. Choirs of, say, thirty girls of about twelve years of age would sing with a sonority and vitality that were sometimes almost staggering. But these performances had the faults of their virtues. The tone was poured out so generously that refinement was lost sight of. This will no doubt come. I felt that I astonished the audience by giving a first place to a small choir of children from Helston who did not happen to possess powerful voices, but who sang with delicate rhythm and nice taste. Other choirs that excelled were those from Redruth and Pool. The fact that one or two teachers could secure beautiful as well as imposing results from these spirited Cornwall children was very satisfactory, and should prove to be a good object-lesson.

Lady Mary Trefusis and all associated with her in this enterprise have every reason to be encouraged with their first year's success.

The chief results of all three days were as follows :

Choral Societies. 'In the merry spring' (Ravenscroft), St. Mary's Wesleyan (Truro).

SMALL TOWNS.

Ladies' Choirs. 'The broken vow' (Selmer), St. Day G.F.S. (Mrs. Martin).

Men's Choirs. 'There is a garden' (Brewer), Marazion (Mr. J. H. Trudgean).

Church and Chapel Choirs. 'Praise the Lord' (Hayes), St. Gluvias Church (Mrs. Blamey).

Choral Societies. 'Come, let us join' (Beale), 'Since thou, O fondest' (Parry), Penryn (Mrs. Blamey).

VILLAGES.

Church and Chapel Choirs. 'Christmas Song' (Prætorius), Sticker Mission Church Choir.

LARGE TOWNS.

Ladies' Choirs. 'Spring' (Harvey Grace), St. Mary's Wesleyan (Truro), (Mr. J. Herbert Williams).

Men's Choirs. 'Feasting I watch' (Elgar), Truro People's Palace (Mr. Wallace Smith).

(Much Commended.)

Church and Chapel Choirs. 'Hear, King of Angels' (Bach), (Equal) St. John's and St. Mary's Wesleyan.

SCHOOL CHOIRS.

First and second places in various classes : (a) Truro College, Redruth County School ; (b) Probus, St. Feock ; (c) Basset Road Girls, Camborne, Helston Wesleyan ; (d) Helston Girls' County School, Camborne Girls' County School ; (e) Truro County School, Probus.

The tests were various rounds. 'The lover's tasks' (Cecil Sharp's Folk-songs), 'Rock-a-bye' (Parry), 'Blackberries' (Myles B. Foster), 'Hawke' (C. H. Lloyd), 'Night has passed away' (Battison Haynes), 'Fairy elves' (Cuthbert Harris), 'Admiral Benbow' (Folk-song), 'The Shepherd's Siren' (C. V. Stanford), 'Hail, Judea' (Handel).

The combined music was 'Land to the leeward' (Parry) and 'By dimpled brook' (Arne).

IV.—ABERDEEN (N.E. SCOTLAND).

June 2, 3, 4, 5.

This festival, although only in its second year, has achieved remarkable success. Last year its results exceeded the hopes of the promoters, and this year's event drew nearly double the number of competitors.

The festival had three distinct sections. First there were the competitions, which were spread over three days ; next there was the Church Choir Festival, which united in one combination no fewer than thirty-two of the city church choirs, and lastly, there was the special choir composed by the happy uniting of choral societies from all parts of the district to perform 'The Messiah.'

The nexus of all these forces is the love of music and the influence of Professor Sanford Terry who, as before explained in these columns, holds the Chair of History in the University. The members of the musical profession in the city were quite willing to work under his generalship.

The results of the competitions showed undoubted progress over those of last year. Some of the singing was of a high standard. In this connection Buckie (Mr. John Barritt) and Fraserburgh (Mr. Clemens) deserve special mention. Mr. D. Stephen, Principal of the Dunfermline School of Music, judged in the school and orchestral classes.

The test-pieces and chief results were as follows :

Mixed choirs of not less than 40 or more than 70 voices : 'With drooping wings' (Purcell), 'My love dwelt in a northern land' (Elgar), 'Evening has lost her throne' (Bantock). Challenge Shield. Peterhead Choral Society (Warren T. Clemens), 214 marks ; Banff Choral Society (Thomas E. Wright), 189 marks.

Mixed choirs of not less than 16 or more than 32 voices : 'In silent night' (Brahms), 'Love, fare thee well' (Brahms), 'Come away, sweet love' (Rathbone). Challenge Shield. Fraserburgh Choral Society (W. T. Clemens), 210 marks ; Aberdeen University Choral Society (C. Sanford Terry), 209 marks ; Aberdeen Part-song (A. W. Miller), 205 marks.

Mixed choirs of not less than 16 or more than 40 voices : 'The Trysting-place' (Brahms) and 'Fain would I change that note' (V. Williams). Gold Medal. Dufftown Choral Union (John N. Taylor), 129 marks ; Ellon Choral Society (Rev. W. Haslewood), 128 marks.

Choirs of Male Voices : 'Hymn to the sun' (Bantock), 'The long day closes' (Sullivan), 'Hail to the chief' (Schubert). Aberdeen Male Voice Choir (Arthur Collingwood), 209 marks (only entry).

Choirs of Female Voices : 'Creation's Hymn' (Beethoven), and 'Waken, waken I day is dawning' (Mackenzie) ; Buckie Ladies' Choir (John Barritt), 141 marks ; Fraserburgh Choral Society (W. T. Clemens), 138 marks ; Miss Christie's Ladies' Choir (Elisabeth Christie), 134 marks ; Elgin Ladies' Choir (Madame Norris-Adams), 133 marks ; Aberdeen Part-Song Choir (A. W. Miller), 132 marks ; Aberdeen University Choral Society (C. Sanford Terry), 128 marks ; Dufftown Ladies' Choir (John N. Taylor), 124 marks ; Training College Ladies' Choir (Elisabeth Christie), 120 marks ; Inverurie Academy Ladies' Choir (T. Cousins), 114 marks.

Church Choirs : 'In divers tongues' (Palestrina) and 'Hail, gladdening Light' (Martin). Challenge Gold Medal. Queen's Cross U.F. Church, Aberdeen (W. T. Clemens), 126 marks ; St. Ninian's Parish Church, Aberdeen (R. Buchanan Morton), 117 marks.

Church Choirs (voluntary). 'Lead, kindly Light' (Sullivan) and 'The salvation of the righteous' (Ouseley). King's College Chapel (Elisabeth Christie), 136 marks ; (equal) U.F. Church, Braemar (Samuel S. Page), and Parish Church, Macduff (John Littlewood), 125 marks each ; High U.F. Church, Banff (Thomas E. Wright), 121 marks ; Ferryhill U.F. Church, Aberdeen (C. M. Stephen), 119 marks.

Church or other choirs from places whose population was below 2,000 : 'Call to remembrance' (Farrant) and 'Blessed are they' (Tours). Dufftown Choir (John N. Taylor), 133 marks ; (equal) Ellon Choral Society (Rev. W. Haslewood), 125 marks, and Skene Parish (G. A. Innes), 125 marks each ; Braemar U.F. (Samuel S. Page), 123 marks.

Juvenile choirs : 'Cleansing fires' (Cowen) and 'How merrily we live' (M. Este). Aberdeen Central School (Charles Soutar), 232 marks ; Macduff Public School (George W. Wilson), 221 marks.

Elementary School Choirs : (a) 'Hail ! Judea' (Handel) and 'Twelve by the clock' (Lloyd). Aberdeen, Broomhill Public School (William D. Watt), 229 marks.

Elementary School Choirs : (b) 'Nymphs and shepherds' (Purcell) and 'I sing because I love to sing' (Pinsuti). Aberdeen, Walker Road (George Crookshanks), 216 marks ; Banff Academy (D. McLeod Brown), 202 marks.

Rural elementary schools: 'Will you walk a little faster?' (Macdonald) and 'Rock-a-bye' (Parry). Burford Public School (Robert Thomson), 215 marks.

Female-voice choirs from business firms, girls' clubs, etc.: 'Hey-ho-hey' (Richards) and 'Bells at Eve' (Abt). Aberdeen, the Broadford Works Female-voice Choir (Muriel Norris-Adams), 120 marks; Aberdeen, Holburn Street Girls' Club (Miss Wright), 119 marks.

String orchestras: 'Lady Radnor's Suite,' Nos. 1, 4, 5 (Parry). Aberdeen University Orchestra (C. Sanford Terry), 212 marks; Aberdeen Queen's Cross Orchestral Society (W. T. Clemens), 206 marks; Banffshire String Orchestra (Thomas E. Wright), 203 marks.

Mixed orchestras: Schubert's Symphony in B minor (first movement). Aberdeen University Orchestra (C. Sanford Terry), 76 marks; Aberdeen Symphony Orchestra (Percival R. Kirby), 75 marks; Banff Orchestral Society (Thomas E. Wright), 68 marks.

The performance of 'The Messiah' by the eleven combined choirs drew an overwhelming audience. The various units had been welded into a whole by the skill of Dr. Coward, and the result was an imposing performance of this oratorio such as had never before been heard in Aberdeen. The choir numbered 500 voices, and there was an efficient orchestra of 80 performers gathered from many parts of Scotland. The soloists were Miss Mabel Manson, Miss Nellie Riach, Mr. Henry Brearley, and Mr. Joseph Lycett. Mr. Warren T. Clemens was the organist.

The Church Choir Festival, held on Sunday afternoon in the Music Hall, was equally successful. It was attended by the municipal authorities in their robes, and by many of the best known residents. The choir of 500 singers was composed, as already stated, of thirty-two of the city church choirs; there was a full orchestra to accompany, and Mr. Arthur Collingwood was at the organ.

The 'Solemn Melody' for strings and organ by Dr. H. Walford Davies was played as an opening voluntary. The singing of the Old Hundredth by all present was deeply impressive. Other items were Sir Hubert Parry's 'Te Deum laudamus' in D (specially orchestrated for the occasion by the composer), 'My soul doth magnify the Lord' (Henry Gadsby), and the fine, broad anthem, 'Hail, gladdening Light' (Sir George Martin). An address was delivered by the Very Reverend The Principal of the University, G. A. Smith, and lessons read by well-known ministers; the Lord Bishop of Aberdeen pronounced the Benediction. Professor Sanford Terry conducted the music.

The Aberdeen Free Press says: 'The North-East of Scotland second musical festival, which was closed yesterday, has been attended with conspicuous success from beginning to end. The festival has been carried out on a more extended scale than last year, and while it continues to enlist sympathy and interest among musical bodies in Aberdeen, it has in greater degree received hearty support and encouragement from many parts of the North of Scotland.'

'The whole programme was admirably arranged and carried out, and Professor Sanford Terry and all those associated with him in an enterprise which has in marked degree commended itself to the public are to be much congratulated and complimented on their efforts for musical culture and development in the North of Scotland.'

'THE FEATURE OF THE FESTIVAL.'

'The result of the festival, so far as its value can be yet appraised, has been exceedingly gratifying. That progress should have been almost entirely confined to the competitive section of the festival is only what must have been expected; the conditions under which the festival performance have to be conducted prevent their becoming in the meantime at least educational agencies of serious importance. Rather must they be regarded as novel and instructive entertainments which make for the interest and financial prosperity of the festival. The real value of the festival has been in the competitions, which have doubled the size of last year so far as both the number of entries and participants are concerned. To every one of these competing singers the festival means weeks of strenuous work and coaching in the finer points of expression and even in voice-production—things which the average conductor has not a great deal of time for in the course of the season's work. The immediate gain will be the raising of the standard of choral singing throughout a considerable part of the festival area, the creation of higher ideals, and a fresh spirit of endeavour. But the benefit of the competitions is not confined to the singers alone; they are also valuable in the making of a musical public, in the creating of intelligent audiences. The enormous increase in the attendance at all the competitions has been evidence of the good fruit which the festival is bearing in this direction. The manner in which the interest of the listeners became absorbed was one of the features of the contests of Friday and Saturday. Repetitions instead of boring the audiences made them more expectant and critical, and as fresh competitions threw new lights upon the composition the points were keenly discussed. The critical standard rose, too, as the competitions proceeded, and the knowing ones did not hesitate to adjudicate in advance or even to criticise Dr. McNaught's decisions. All this was of immense value, and if we are only in the evolutionary stage, the increasing activity and interest excites many hopes for the future.

'More support and still more is what is wanted for the festival, that and a close study of the conditions under which the movement is to be developed. Choralists outside Aberdeen have done gallantly, indeed the credit of the festival practically belongs to them. They have supported every branch at an effort and expense which the city competitors know nothing of. Only a small fraction of Aberdeen's musical resources has been represented in the festival. The entry of church choirs, for instance, was ridiculously small, and there was no representation whatever in the highest class of choral competition. The only gratifying feature, so far as Aberdeen was concerned, was the appearance of two choirs in the contest for working girls. This, as Dr. McNaught remarked, was the greatest capture of the festival, the class of material which is most desired and for which the benefits offered are most substantial. If the festival should be the means of establishing a number of such choirs (and there is material for a score in Aberdeen), it will have done enough to justify its existence.

'The great fact to be grasped is that these competitions have proved themselves to have a solid and practical value. They have already increased the efficiency of choralists, and heightened the interest of the public in choral singing in various parts of the festival area; they have proved no less popular than helpful, and, with a continuation of the present favourable circumstances, the revival or creation of a genuine taste for choral music throughout the entire North-East of Scotland district seems to be only a matter of time.'

THE COMPETING CHOIRS AND CHORAL WORKS.

We are informed that the North-East of Scotland Choral Societies interested in the Festival performed the following works during the season 1909-10:

Aberdeen Choral Union (Mr. A. Collingwood), 'Golden Legend' and Mozart's 'Requiem.'
Aberdeen Musical Institute (Mr. W. Lister), 'Creation' (at City Concerts).
Peterhead Choral Society (Mr. W. T. Clemens), 'Bavarian Highlands' (Elgar); 'Messiah'; 'Hiawatha' (complete).
Fraserburgh Choral Society (Mr. W. Clemens), 'St. Paul'; 'Faust' selection (Gounod).
Dufftown Choral Society (Mr. J. Taylor), 'Messiah'; 'Hiawatha' (complete).
Banff and Macduff (Mr. T. E. Wright), 'Messiah'; miscellaneous festival part-songs.
Elgin Choral (Mr. J. Barritt), 'Messiah' (part); 'Maritana'.
Turriff Choral (Mr. T. E. Wright), miscellaneous (chorus and orchestra); 'Unfinished Symphony'; festival part-songs.
Ellon Choral (Rev. W. Haslewood), 'Joan of Arc' (Gaul).
Buckie Musical (Mr. J. Barritt), 'Yeomen of the Guard' (staged).
Portsoy Choral (Mr. J. W. Grieve), 'Messiah.'

V.—LYTHAM (LANCASHIRE).

June 8, 9, 10, 11.

The festival held at this attractive sea-side residential town was again eminently successful. There is an 'atmosphere' about the management of the scheme that gives satisfaction to the competitors. This is the only way to account for the popularity of the festival, because the accommodation afforded by the Pier Pavilion, in which perforce the important competitions must be held, is limited. Everyone cheerfully puts up with some personal inconvenience. The gentry who attend this, to them, alluring function seem keenly interested. At no centre at which I have had the task of adjudicating have I heard finer all-round results in some departments than those achieved at Lytham. The name of the place at once associates fine music and fine performance.

It is a remarkable fact that some of the most thrilling performances were those given by children. In the chief young girls' solo class there were about thirty competitors. The test was that surpassingly beautiful song 'Know'st thou the land,' by Beethoven. Many musicians have set this touching and beautiful poem of Goethe, but none of the remarkable compositions it has inspired excel that of Beethoven in directness, searching expression, and lucid simplicity. That half-a-dozen or more of these children sang the song with an expression that forced the tears from many eyes gives food for thought. What is the use of preaching that a singer must go through a long technical course in order to gain command of the means of expression, when with little or no tuition these remarkable children wring your heart as no trained artist can do? Space will not allow me to say all I should like about the extraordinary skill and beauty of some of the action-songs.

The choral performance reached a high plane. I shall not readily forget the, to me at least, almost perfect performance of Berlioz's 'Ophelia' by the ladies of Mr. Clifford Higgins's Blackpool choir. It provided one of those thrills that are a joy and solace to an adjudicator.

The chief mixed-voice choir section was almost as interesting. Its results turned mainly on the interpretation of Tchaikovsky's 'Angel Spirits.' Amongst other fine points in this piece, there is a remarkable 'Amen' in the middle. The solemn effect possible here seemed to me to be very generally missed. The interpretation depends largely upon a controlled ecstasy not hectic, here and there contrasted with something like abasement and awe.

Mr. Whittaker's two choirs (he competed against himself and won!) sang very finely, and so did nearly all the competitors. The male-voice choir class brought forward three of the finest organizations of this class in the north. Manchester was in excellent form, polished and well groomed, and withal seized of the proper interpretations. Mr. Harry Evans, who also adjudicated, conducted the combined men's-voice choir through 'Strike the lyre' with splendid effect. I wondered whether this excellent glee had ever been better sung. The tone was glorious.

Mr. Crook the prime mover, Mr. Allon Wilson the unobtrusive but firmly governing Secretary, and the loyal committee deserve hearty congratulations—and the way they even more appreciate—financial support.

The tests and prize-winners in the chief solo classes were:

Soprano: 'Dove Sono' (Mozart) and 'Pleading' (Elgar).—Miss Hilda Jennings.

Contralto: 'Trysting Tree' (Walthew) and Angel's song from 'Gerontius' (Elgar).—Miss Clara Cunliffe.

Tenor: 'True Love' (Brahms) and 'On wings of song' (Mendelssohn).—Mr. H. Jones.

Baritone: 'Whence' (Parry) and 'I am a roamer' (Mendelssohn).—Mr. William Earl.
Pianoforte.—Miss Vida Whittaker.
Girls' vocal solo.—Miss Mabel Garlick.

In the quartet-singing contests, prizes were won by Apollo, Sheffield (male-voice) and Blackpool Clarendon (mixed-voice).

In the local choral competitions first places were secured by Lytham Parish Church Choir (Mr. S. H. Broughton), Wrea Green (Mr. T. H. Myles), and Singleton School Choirs (Mr. Thos. Dawson); and St. John's (Miss Latham) in the action song competition for local schools. Claremont Congregational (Mr. H. Whittaker) were winners in the chief class for church choirs; the tests were: Jekyll's 'Thou wilt keep him in perfect peace' and Brahms's 'In silent night.' Twelve small male-voice choirs sang Goetz's 'A forest scene' and Bantock's 'Give a rouse'; the 'O.M.'s, St. Helen's (Mr. S. Bertram Siddall) were first and C.W.S. Male Choir (Mr. Lewis Evans) second.

W. G. McNAUGHT.

NEW JERSEY, U.S.A.

ELIZABETH, April 14, 15.

According to the newspaper report furnished to us, the eleven schools that took part in these competitions are nameless and are distinguished by numbers. We therefore give only the test-pieces and the number of entries:

Unison song (11 entries): 'There were four lilies' (Haynes).

Two-part song, mixed-voices (6 entries): 'Snowflake' (Edmunds) and 'Lullaby' (Brahms).

Two-part song, boys (5 entries): 'The rain song' (Pearson).

Three-part song (five entries): 'Blow, blow, thou winter wind' (Stevens). There was plentiful combined singing in unison and parts by the competing choirs; the three-part songs thus performed included Beethoven's 'Night' and Bach's 'My heart ever faithful,' both unaccompanied. Selections were played by school orchestras, and the Liederkranz Society contributed part-singing under the direction of Professor Carl Hein, who adjudicated in company with Dr. F. R. Rix, Mr. G. E. Stubbs, Miss M. J. Wilbraham, and Mr. D. H. Snyder. The competition was organized, and the combined singing directed, by Mr. Thomas Wilson.

PLAINFIELD, April 28, 29.

The competing schools in these competitions were Bound Brook, Elizabeth, New Brunswick, Plainfield, North Plainfield, Rahway, Westfield, Roselle, Roselle Park and Somerville. The test-pieces were as follows:

Junior (10 entries): 'There were four lilies' (Haynes).
Two-part (9 entries): 'Wanderer's night song' (Rubinstein).
Three-part (7 entries): 'Blow, blow, thou winter wind' (Stevens).

Boys' two-part (9 entries): 'The rain concert' (Pearson).
High School section, four-part song (9 entries): 'Good-night, good-night beloved' (Pinsuti).

Elizabeth were successful in all classes but the last, in which they were second to Plainfield. They also secured the prize for orchestral playing against two other competitors; the test was Bach's 'Schauspiel Overture.' There were contests for solo-singing and sight-reading. The adjudicators were Mr. Ralph Baldwin, Mr. C. Whitney Coombs, and Miss Mari Ruef Hofer.

The (New York) New Music Review for June says: "The fact that the English custom of holding periodic musical festivals and "competitions" in schools is being largely followed in this country is a source of no little encouragement to choirmasters and others interested in the vocal training of boys and girls. To foster a liking for vocal study, and to maintain a keen interest in school singing, it is well to depart occasionally from dullness of the usual routine. When children are given an opportunity for publicly exhibiting their ability in sight-reading and in general choral work, a most wholesome stimulus is provided, not only for the pupils, but also for their instructors.

The greatest interest was evinced in the competition, not only by the participants, but also by the large audience that assembled to hear the singing.

'In connection with this subject we wish to call attention to the advantage of adopting some fixed standard of marking at competitions. There is no standard system, and the adjudicators agree upon a more or less casual plan, oftentimes in a hurried meeting just before entering the concert room.

Thus the headings under which the marks are placed vary, and the numerical method of marking varies also.

'In some cases there are but three or four headings, in other cases there may be many more. The marks may be graded from 1 to 10, or all the way up to 100, or alphabetically, or by means of written expressions.

'Even in England, where school competitions are vastly more numerous than they are here, there is no standardized system of marking.

'A scheme of marking that has found extensive favour in England is the following: Accuracy and time, 10; tone, balance, blend, and intonation, 20; attack, pronunciation, and enunciation, 10; expression, pace, rhythm, and interpretation, 20; general effect, 20; total, 80.'

[This is the scheme suggested and discussed in our issue for January, 1910.—ED. COMPETITION RECORD.]

SMALL HEATH, BIRMINGHAM.

May 28.

At a competitive gathering held at the Conference Hall, three choral contests were arranged. The tests and winners were the following:

JUVENILE CHOIRS (3 entries).

'Gentle swallows' (Roland Rogers).
Equal { Bordesley (Mr. M. H. Jones).
1st. { Coventry Road Wesleyan (Mr. H. J. Baldwin).

MALE VOICES (10 entries).

'Spartan heroes' (Protheroe).
1st. Stourbridge Institute (Mr. H. Woodall).
2nd. Wolverhampton (Mr. W. Morgan).

MIXED VOICES (9 entries).

'Into the silent land' (Gaul).
1st. Mr. Ford's Choir, Wolverhampton.
Mr. A. R. Gaul adjudicated.

WORKING GIRLS' CLUBS (LONDON).

(June 4 and 11.)

A competition in musical drill and singing for members of the various London clubs for working girls was held under the auspices of the Girls' Evening Homes at the Northampton Institute, Clerkenwell, on June 4. The singing contest was divided into two parts, one for the best rendering of 'The Boatman's Song' in two parts (Abt), and another for proficiency in unison singing. The adjudicator, Mr. G. von Holst, awarded the prize in the first event to the Lillie Road Club, and in the second to the Bethnal Green Choir.

Another similar competition was held at Johanna Street Schools, Lambeth, on June 11, instituted by the Cornwall Girls' Club. In this case the vocal contest was divided into three sections, one for two-part singing, a second for folk-song singing, and a third for sight-singing. All three events were won by the Roehampton Club, the set pieces being 'Evening' (Smart) and 'Oh no, John.' Miss Haweis was the judge.

LONDON SUNDAY SCHOOL CHOIR FESTIVAL.

CRYSTAL PALACE, June 15.

In the competitive section of this event there were divisions for junior and adult choirs. One test was prescribed in each division, the choice of a second test was left to the choirs. The entries and results were as follows:

JUNIOR CHOIRS.

Test: 'When Spring unlocks the flowers' (Smart).
Mr. J. A. Squire's Children's Choir.
'Excelsior' (Balfé).
3rd. Queen's Park Congregational S.S. (Mr. W. Boylett).
'Excelsior' (Balfé).
Faversham S.S. (Mr. R. J. Mann).
'Listening angels' (Stainer).
Cottage Green S.S. (Mr. J. W. Desmond).
'Out with the tide' (Berger).
1st. Willesden Junior Choir (Mr. J. J. Bramley).
'Fairies' lullaby' (F. A. Marshall).
Hounslow District Junior Choir (Mr. C. F. Yates).
'Welcome, bright and sunny Spring' (Labbett).
'King's Own' Mission Choir (Mr. E. A. Hall).
'A forest ramble' (Abt).
Manor Park Wesleyan Juv. Choir (Mr. A. C. Atkins).
'Come, away, breezes play' (A. L. Cowley).
2nd. Vernon S.S. Junior Choir (Mr. C. W. Pickering).
'Excelsior' (Balfé).

SENIOR CHOIRS.

Test: 'The sands of Dee' (Macfarren).
Bush Hill Park Choral Society (Mr. Dai Lewis).
'As torrents in Summer' (Elgar).
Vernon Choral Society (Mr. C. W. Pickering).
'Homeward' (Leslie).
1st. Camberwell Choral Society (Mr. W. J. Hooper).
'Hymn to Music' (Dudley Buck).
Mr. L. C. Venables adjudicated. The concerts are noticed elsewhere.

MORECAMBE MUSICAL FESTIVAL.

June 18.

FINAL DAY.

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

Morecambe's postponed festival was brought to a conclusion on June 18, amidst conditions which must unhappily have involved the executive in very severe financial loss. At no time did the audiences approach what we have been accustomed to see on the closing day of this great meeting. Of the original quartet of judges only Mr. S. H. Nicholson was away, Messrs. Bantock, Corder, and Noble discharging these onerous duties. Of the ten 'challenge shield' choirs the only absentee was Consett and District (Durham), but it was noticeable that those who did appear had thinned ranks, one choir not reaching even fifty voices. The selections in the female voice, the 'alto-lead' male-voice, and one piece in the 'tenor lead' male-voice classes left much to be desired; such aimless selections in the past would never have raised this festival to its commanding eminence, and nowadays both choirs and audiences know 'what's what' in the quality of works chosen for performance, and those in authority should find no room for fifth-rate compositions when first and second-rate are not exhausted. In female-voice works there may be some excuse; in this class of composition there is undoubtedly fine scope for our young composers. These choirs can do anything, and deserve much finer music than they usually get, as anybody will testify who happened to hear Gustav von Holst's eight-part setting of 'Ave Maria' two years ago at Blackpool.

Carlisle Madrigal Society well earned their success in the smaller mixed-voice class, the music comprising Edgar Tinel's 'Angelus' and Cliffe Forrester's 'Call of the breeze,' a thing of quickly fleeting moods; they would probably do well in better company. The Barnoldswick Choir won the 'alto-lead' male-voice competition, and Lancaster, under Mr. J. W. Aldous, were victorious in the female-voice class, the Lowther (Penrith) Choir coming second, well ahead of the formidable Barrow and Morecambe Ladies' Choirs.

In the principal male-voice division the contestants were: Colne Orpheus, Lancaster (Mr. R. T. Grossé) and Manchester Orpheus; Whitehaven and Habergham had also entered originally, but were unable to attend on the altered date.

Sibelius's 'Hail! O moon' is music utterly unlike any other sort of male-voice composition, particularly in the opening section; it sounds just like the improvised declamatory utterances that are heard at Welsh Eisteddfodau in the harp-accompanied penillion-singing, save that a choir and not an individual sings. The music transported one into a new world—quite remote from our western thought and speech, and one felt something of the primitive civilization that had called it forth. In the music of Max Reger, whose 'Call of spring' formed the final test-piece, it is quite likely that the 'crack' Lancashire male-voice choirs will find abundant new material upon which to spend their efforts: a vein has been tapped (last October at Blackpool and now at Morecambe) which should yield rich stores of pure metal. Not improbably this composer may exercise a marked influence on the present trend of male-voice compositions in this country. When will some selection committee have the pluck to set his 'Palm Sunday morning' motet as a test-piece? In the absence of Habergham this contest was shorn of much of its keen interest; Lancaster and Colne, although making valiant efforts, were never within measurable distance of their more experienced rivals from Manchester, though the marking may not confirm this view.

In the Challenge Shield Class, the preliminary tests were the Oriana madrigal, 'The nymphs and shepherds danced,' of George Marson, who flourished in Elizabethan days, this work being his sole claim to distinction, and Brahms's 'Abendständchen.' From this trial, Barrow, Blackpool, Lancaster and Southport emerged satisfactorily. In the evening, Cornelius's 'Love and Youth' and Elgar's 'Go, song of mine' made heavy demands upon the technical and emotional powers of these well-tried choirs; they might have been eating ripe cherries, from the way Cornelius's work was rattled off, dead in tune every time. Of all this composer's works for a cappella choir, this is certainly the least interesting; its chief strength is in its rhythmical qualities, and here Barrow, singing at a great pace, were marvellously good. Blackpool started more deliberately, and their accelerations seem to grow out of each other more naturally; Lancaster had a very jumpy rhythm, and had not any conspicuous beauty of tone, as had Southport. In the Elgar piece, Lancaster had a wonderfully good tenor tone in the quasi recitative passages; Mrs. Bourne gave her Barrow sopranos their heads in the strenuous middle section, and they overwhelmed all the remaining parts. It was exhilarating, but scarcely convincing. Blackpool's reading was instinct with character. Whatever of spirituality there is in this fine poem was brought out with absolute sincerity; their sopranos had not the intrepid qualities of the Barrow or Southport singers, but they caught much of the great emotional beauty of the work. Only the marks of the four leading choirs were read out, no comments being made by Mr. Noble, except in very general terms:

Order of Singing	Madrigal	Brahms	Cornelius	Elgar	Total Order.
3. Lancaster	94 (1)	95 (2)	91 (4)	98 (1)	378 1st.
4. Southport	88 (3)	88 (2)	93 (3)	90 (4)	359 4th.
5. Blackpool G. & M.	86 (4)	87 (3)	95 (2)	93 (3)	361 3rd.
7. Barrow	90 (2)	88 (2)	96 (1)	97 (2)	371 2nd.

Mr. J. W. Aldous was the recipient of many congratulations, including some from the choirs less successful than his own.

Professor Bantock is strongly of opinion that the only way to arouse interest in orchestral playing is to prescribe modern works and not such old-fashioned things as Gade's 'Novelletten' and the familiar 'Prometheus' overture of Beethoven. The amateur orchestral playing interested him tremendously, and in speaking of Nelson's rendering, he remarked that many bands of professional musicians play with less certainty and distinction.

The results not noted above were as follows: Small mixed-voice choirs (24 to 36 voices).—1st, Carlisle (186); 2nd, Padiham Wesley (179); and 3rd, Haverigg (178).

Chief male-voice (tenor lead) (24 to 40 voices).—1st, Manchester Orpheus (286); 2nd, Colne Orpheus (279); and 3rd, Lancaster (261).

String orchestras and full orchestras.—1st, Nelson Congregational Orchestral Society (Mr. C. Townsley); and 2nd, Altrincham Orchestral Society (Mr. C. H. Fogg).

COMING EVENTS.

The 'Grand Concours Musical' at Rheims on August 14 and 15, to which we called attention in the June issue of the SCHOOL MUSIC REVIEW, is to be both national and international, and is open to 'Orphéons, Chœurs Mixtes, Harmonies, Fanfares, Etudiantines, Trompettes, and Trompes de Chasse.' Societies from all parts of France and from foreign countries are invited to take part in the competitions. Two test-pieces are prescribed, and an additional sight-reading test is made compulsory. We give this information for the benefit of possible visitors; the entries closed on May 1. The general secretary is M. Ambroise Petit, Secrétaire Général du Concours, Rheims.

HARLECH.

This festival will be held in the Old Castle on July 6. There will be three meetings, in which about fifteen choirs have promised to take part. In the evening ~~not~~ all the choirs will unite in a performance of 'The Messiah,' under the conductorship of Mr. O. O. Roberts.

THE NATIONAL TEMPERANCE CHORAL UNION.

The annual choral contests of this organization will take place at the Crystal Palace on July 9. The four divisions, in each of which three prizes are offered, are open to: (a) Mixed-voice choirs, 60 to 100 voices; (b) Mixed-voice choirs, 30 to 50 voices; (c) Male-voice choirs, 20 to 30 voices; and (d) Juvenile choirs, 40 voices and under. The adjudicators are Mr. Dan Price and Mr. George Merritt. Mr. A. H. Rogers is the hon. secretary and Mr. W. G. W. Goodworth the musical director.

There will be a festival at Llandudno on Saturday, October 15. All the classes are open. The chief choral class is that for male voices. Dr. McNaught and Mr. Harry Evans will judge. The secretary is Mr. Herbert Hooson, Musical Festival Offices.

ANTONIO STRADIVARI

HIS LIFE AND WORK (1644-1737)

BY

W. Henry Hill, Arthur F. Hill, F.S.A.,
and Alfred E. Hill.

A NEW AND CHEAPER EDITION.

This Book contains the whole of the original text and most of the illustrations, with the difference that the coloured plates have been replaced by photographic reproductions. On the other hand, however, it includes an additional illustration in colours, by way of frontispiece, of the celebrated Stradivari Violin, known as "The Messie."

In reviewing the earlier edition, The Times said: "That the authors were well qualified for the task is plain. They belong to a family in which violin making has been traditional for generations, they have been aided by the family lore and guided by wide and varied experience. Thus equipped, they have devoted themselves to a careful examination and comparison of the great maker's instruments, and the list cited justifies the conclusion that there can be few which have escaped their notice. The same journal refers to the book as 'the most important contribution yet made to the history of the great fiddle-maker and his work.'"

MACDONALD SMITH'S

SYSTEM

OF TOUCH AND TECHNIQUE.
("FROM BRAIN TO KEYBOARD.")

VON BÜLOW says:

"For a pianist, three things are necessary—the first is Technique, the second is Technique, and the third is Technique."

The MACDONALD SMITH System is indispensable for all who wish to attain the highest degree of proficiency in Touch and Technique with a minimum of work.

A pupil (L.R.A.M.) of one of the foremost London pianoforte teachers writes, after taking half the Course of Lessons:—

"I also played two solos, and was greatly surprised at my success. I never played so well in public before, and I think that the credit must go to you. This in spite of the very little time I have for practising."

MADAME AMY SHERWIN'S

VOCAL ACADEMY AND CONCERT BUREAU.

The Evening Standard says: "Madame Amy Sherwin is certainly not one of those people who say one thing and do another. The short discussion that the highly successful singing mistress indulged in, following as it did upon her delivery of a group of songs, left little doubt in the minds of her hearers as to the soundness of her methods or her success in putting them into practice. All Madame Sherwin's songs were remarkable for their distinction of style, unflinching breath-control, clear enunciation and unlaboured production."

The Daily Telegraph says: "Madame Amy Sherwin charmed her audience by her easy and artistic singing. All her songs were delightfully rendered."

Of Mr. FRASER GANGE, the phenomenally successful Basso-cantante, and pupil of Madame Amy Sherwin,

The Times says: "His voice possesses a really beautiful quality. Particularly noticeable was the beauty of his mezzotone."

The Daily Telegraph says: "Right admirably was she followed in this connection by Mr. Fraser Gange, who clearly does her infinite credit, having learnt from her notably the value of style and the immense advantage of a perfect diction."

The Westminster Gazette says: "Another enjoyable feature of the concert was the fine singing of Mr. Fraser Gange, a young artist of whom more should certainly be heard. It is rare, indeed, to come across an English vocalist who sings with such fervour and intensity of expression, and at the same time in a style so finished."

The Observer says: "There can certainly be no question that Mr. Fraser Gange will easily make his way into the front rank of English singers."

ROBERT SCHUMANN.

ABOUT SCHUMANN'S PIANOFORTE MUSIC.

BY FANNY DAVIES.

Being far from a practised writer, I should have hesitated to undertake to put into print my views on Robert Schumann's pianoforte music. But I cannot resist the kind invitation of the Editor of the Musical Times, to say a few words on a subject which has filled such an important part in my musical life.

Reviewing the development of the great pianoforte literature of the world, the first question that occurs is this: What position does Schumann take in it? The great line of strictly classical pianoforte composers ended with Beethoven. In Schumann we find the beginning of that new style of pianoforte music which has been called 'Romantic.' In this sense Schumann was both a revolutionary and a pioneer in giving us intimate and descriptive music. He created a new genre of pianoforte literature, relating as he did, stories in music, portraying people, and everything that went on in the world at his time. And here let me say emphatically that his portraying is spiritual and emotional and not photographic. Schumann's absolutely descriptive movements—as, for instance, the clock striking twelve at the end of the 'Davidsbündler Tänze,' Op. 6—are sub-conscious coincidences. In a letter to Clara Wieck, we find him expressing his delight at discovering this particular instance, some time after finishing the composition; and his own words in another letter will perhaps throw the clearest light on his whole method of writing: 'Everything that goes on in the world affects me, and I think it over in my own way: politics, literature, and people; and afterwards, all this seeks to embody itself in Music, to find its outlet there. Everything typical of the times impresses me, and I have to re-express it in Music. All this I do not reflect upon, am not consciously aware of whilst composing; it comes to me afterwards only.'

The salient features of Schumann's pianoforte music are its great rhythmical variety and complexity, the extraordinary wealth and 'fineness'—subtlety—(Feinheit) of inner voices, all forming a well-balanced whole that fits the idea he wishes at the moment to convey. The inner polyphony is so important and significant, that even when it has only a subordinate part to play it is an indispensable one. It follows, then, that unless Schumann's manifold subtleties are fully realised, the more obvious, in fact the leading beauty, of his writing is not fully realised in presentation.

Surely we all agree that Schumann's pianoforte music is of an intimate kind. And what is 'intimate' if not the presentation of esoteric, delicate beauty?

Again, Schumann's manner of writing is so often in chords that one cannot lay too great stress on the importance of playing chords in a way that will convey to the hearer the significance of the harmonies therein contained. They are not padded octaves! And it will not do to force out melody or exaggerate a rhythmic scheme which must necessarily imply a neglect of the less obvious—but just as great—beauties. Take for example the little 'Nachtstück' in F: what a different meaning the top notes convey when the changing middle notes get their full value!

In order to better realise the spirit of Schumann's pianoforte music, one should make acquaintance with the literary works of Theodor Hoffmann and of Jean Paul Richter. Both these writers are full of the exuberant madness of spring and youth, and bursting with fantastic imagination ('Schwärmerei' and 'Fantasterei'). They, as well as Clara Wieck, largely influenced his mind when young. One should also become acquainted with Schumann's own literary work, and above all with his letters, for here we find the true key to the twofold nature of Schumann, which he christened separately as E. and F.—Eusebius the tender, the yearning—the dreamy (der Schwärmer); and Florestan the passionate, wild and exuberant. It is characteristic of Florestan when joyous that he almost invariably breaks out into $\frac{3}{4}$ (= valse time!); and of Eusebius that he is the dreamer of beautiful things and not a sickly sentimentalist.

In playing the music of Schumann, as of any other great composer, one has of course to follow the simple law (not so simple to carry out) of adapting oneself to the style and type of composition. This is a technical as well as an interpretative problem, for the technique and touch must naturally be in keeping with the style and type of the work one plays.

Take, for instance, those three great 'story-telling' pieces of Schumann: the 'Kinderscenen,' the 'Waldscenen,' and the 'Kreisleriana.' Should it not be obvious (alas! that it is not always so) that the 'Kinderscenen,' which are stories about childhood and written with corresponding simplicity and directness, should be played with simplicity and directness. Yet how often one hears some of the best known of these little pieces rendered in a most offensively sentimental and melodramatic style!

The 'Waldscenen,' on the other hand, expressing as they mostly do the simplicity of nature but not of childhood, obviously demand a greater and broader style of technique and touch; yet they would be completely spoiled if one were to apply to them the style of playing demanded by the 'Kreisleriana,' with its gorgeous colouring and, throughout, fantastic imagination.

Unfortunately the composer cannot dispense with the reproducer. Has not, then, the reproducer a very great responsibility, and ought he not to 'know his place' when he comes in contact with a genius like Schumann's? To pick out certain details arbitrarily, and grossly to exaggerate them, thereby destroying the whole true proportion of the parts the composer has laid stress upon, is often the only way a player knows of being original.

Schumann was a poet with full knowledge of the balance of construction with detail which go to make a great work of Art; and he was most particular that his marks should be the means of conveying his intentions as clearly as possible.

Is it not, therefore, a gross act of inartistic vandalism not to pay the minutest attention to every detail in the works of a great composer who knew exactly what he wished to say, and how to say it; but who being dead cannot defend himself?

Editors too, have a great deal to answer for. To quote an instance among many; in a much-used edition of 'Grillen' (No. 4 of the Phantasiestücke, Op. 12), the valse passage beginning at bar 26 reads thus:

Observe where the slurs are placed. But Schumann himself says:

Note the difference and the fingering, and note Florestan's exuberant jump, clearly expressed by the position of the mark ^ which separates the second from the third beat.

The one so uncommon and fantastic; the other so very ordinary!

I cannot lay too much stress on the following points: (a) the necessity for the most conscientious attention, not only to the obvious but to the less obvious rhythmical schemes, and to all the many-sided and varied accentuations, the fantastic and emotional lines of which are as characteristic of Florestan as are the long drawn, deep-breathing melodies and phrases characteristic of Eusebius. (b) Das 'Getragene': the giving of full value to the inner voices (but never to the detriment of the whole picture); (c) the giving of full value to the basses, whether of Florestan or of Eusebius.

Eusebius begs for an absolute command of legato,—tone-binding by the fingers. He also begs not to be judged sentimentally, though he is full of sentiment, which is such a different thing.

And now a word about Clara Schumann's demand for 'hineinlegen.' This curious and beautiful word she applied whenever she wanted to bring out the full emotional and spiritual importance of any particular idea in a work, whether melodic or polyphonic. The meaning of the word cannot be realised by technique alone. It suggests something spiritual and emotional, and demands the right touch on the pianoforte, and it must have behind it the warmth of human affection such as is conveyed by the pressure of a hand one loves. Therefore it will be easily seen that 'hineinlegen' as used by Clara Schumann, does not mean extreme digging into the keys in order to produce a 'warm' tone, which after all that method can never do. As the element of human affection is such an indispensable feature of all Schumann's pianoforte music, 'hineinlegen' cannot and must not be overlooked.

In conclusion, may I say that the best guide for all Schumann-lovers, far better than any descriptive writing of mine, is (notwithstanding a very few insignificant printer's errors) contained within the covers of Clara Schumann's monumental edition of Robert Schumann's works.

SCHUMANN'S ORCHESTRATION.—BY F. CORDER.

It is unfortunate that when a composer has once been accepted as a genius his admirers will no longer permit him to be criticised in any way. There lives yet in my memory the storm of indignation awakened in Germany, in 1877, by a newspaper article by Joseph Rubinstein, in which the writer affirmed that Schumann's over-use of the rosalia, or sequence, in melody was a serious weakness in his composition. It was an undeniable, obvious fact, but Schumann was then at the height of a popularity which has lately begun to fade, and his worshippers would not have it spoken. I, too, have got myself singularly disliked on occasion by venturing to criticise Schumann's orchestration. I doubt if I shall do so on the present occasion, because it is evident that people are not so controversial or so enthusiastic over the musicians they admire as they once were. Also I am older, and can do my fault-finding more gently.

The art of writing effectively for the orchestra has arrived in these days to such a pitch that much music of undeniable merit that once was popular now appears tame and insipid. Schumann's works have suffered really too severely from the competition of Tchaikovsky, Wagner and Strauss, even his finest overtures and symphonies but rarely finding their way into our London programmes. There is no help for this: in the struggle for existence the more brilliant works will inevitably drive out the less; so if I occupy my pen with discussing Schumann's merits and weaknesses, those who disagree with me may take comfort from the reflection that, as Mr. Toots says, 'It's of no consequence, thank you!'

Those who know a good deal of Schumann's music can hardly fail to notice certain characteristics in it which are unorchestral. The uniformity of method, the almost perpetual full harmony and want of interest in the lower parts owing to the paucity of passage-work, the lack of natural polyphony and consequent absence of rests—these are the features which almost preclude successful orchestration. Again, as with the pianoforte, so with the violin and other instruments: though many lovely ideas are given them to utter, the composer seems to have little feeling for instrumental effect: his A minor Violin sonata could be played with better effect on a viola, and all his pieces for clarinet or oboe sound just as well on anything else. In 'Paradise and the Peri' the first violins only go outside the treble staff about once in ten pages, and indeed the gravest weakness of his orchestration is that not only is the melodic outline confined to a very narrow space, but the entire musical outline is rarely allowed to spread to the extreme octaves. The result of this is that the instruments of high and low pitch are never considered, and only double the principal part an octave higher or lower. The amount of perfunctory 'doubling' in Schumann's orchestration is enormous. Of course, Schumann wrote at a time when the horns and trumpets were limited to the use of 'open notes,' a restriction which was particularly unfortunate for his gracefully chromatic harmony. The sagacious Beethoven made musical capital out of these very defects of the instruments; Schumann could not, and hardly ever tried to do so. For him music was just poetry and nothing else. Yet we get glimpses now and then of delightful orchestral effects which seem to indicate that, if he could have been induced to turn his thoughts towards technical matters, he would have written very much better. Such glimpses are in 'Paradise and the Peri,' at the tenor solo commencing Part II., where the oboe is used most deliciously, and again in the succeeding chorus, where running passages on the violins afford almost the only semiquaver movement in the entire work. For the rest, it is really extraordinary how dismal this lovely work sounds on the orchestra and how well it sounds on the pianoforte. The overture to 'Genoveva' is perhaps Schumann's most successful piece of scoring. The effect in the second subject, where the melody is played by strings and wind together, thus:

is characteristic, but sounds very ugly in the continuation:

this (like Beethoven's syncopated scale-passage in the 'Leonora' No. 3) being one of those effects suitable only to the pianoforte; but the Coda is really brilliant, the violins being at last taken to their upper octave, where they play the above subject in double-bowed quavers, while the trombones thunder out an energetic phrase below.

The Overture to 'Manfred,' one of Schumann's most beautifully conceived compositions, suffers terribly from the badness of the writing for strings. The unhappy idea of conveying a sombre impression by writing in E flat minor is bad enough, but from the first three fierce chords to the end the violins are written for with such curious awkwardness as to suggest a student-composer who knows no instrument but the harmonium. The second violins, save for four bars in the introduction, never touch their first string at all. One can be as gloomy and darkly passionate as possible, as one may see in the third act of 'Tristan and Isolde,' without making one's orchestra sound feeble.

When Schumann writes a few bars for harmony of wood-wind alone, it is really strange to observe how he contrives to place the oboes just where they refuse to blend with the rest. Having no valve-horns, he is often obliged to use the high notes of the horns, which also stick out too prominently. The opening bars of the Pianoforte concerto exemplify this. In this same work it is also interesting to notice the exquisite impression produced by the subject of the slow movement, where for once we hear the violoncello and violin up high, contrasting so markedly with the dull tone-quality of the other portions.

In the symphonies, particularly those in B flat and C, the beauty of the themes makes one disregard the total absence of passage-work and consequent poverty in the string parts, but the E flat Symphony might be played through without any wind instruments at all, the entire work being practically in full harmony for strings. What little technique Schumann had gradually waned and faded as his brain succumbed to disease, until his last compositions dwindled to characterless pieces of four-part harmony. The overture to 'Faust,' and many of the minor choral works, date from a late period in his life, and therefore may be passed over in sympathetic silence, but the compositions of his earlier and brighter time all exhibit a mere student-knowledge of the art of orchestration, and—in spite of brilliant flashes here and there—do not, as a whole, show either resourcefulness or invention of effects. It is most curious to compare Schumann with his contemporary, Berlioz, in this matter. Berlioz had hardly any melodic invention, nor feeling for harmony, yet he wrote with marvellous effectiveness. Schumann had an inexhaustible spring of both, yet a large proportion of even his vocal works has to be laid aside as uninteresting. But you cannot sit down to the pianoforte and play any work whatever by Berlioz for pleasure, whereas even Schumann's least successful pieces are pleasant to go through. That fact bears upon their instrumentation. To write effectively for orchestra one does not want only melody and harmony: florid passages are absolutely indispensable, and it was just these which were Schumann's weakest point and Berlioz's strongest.

SCHUMANN AND MENDELSSOHN.

In the biographical sketch of Schumann given in our last number it was remarked that :

Schumann was in fact an ardent admirer of Mendelssohn's music, but there is no evidence that Mendelssohn similarly appreciated Schumann's music.

Sir Alexander Mackenzie draws our attention to the following passages from Mendelssohn's Letters:

Berlin, 1844. To Buxton, London.

My friend Dr. Schumann wishes for an opportunity to publish his new work 'Paradise and Peri' in your country, and has desired me to write you my impression of his work. I must accordingly tell you that I have heard and read the new work of Schumann with the greatest pleasure.

That it has afforded me a treat which made me easily forget the unanimous applause it has gained at the two performances at Leipsic and two performances at Dresden (which took place last month), and I think that it is a very important and beautiful work, full of many eminent beauties.

As for expression and poetical feeling, it ranks very high : the choruses are as well written as the solo parts are melodious and winning.

In short, it is a worthy translation of that beautiful inspiration of your great poet, Moore, and I think the feeling of being indebted to that poet for the charm that pervades the whole music has induced the composer to wish your countrymen to become acquainted with his work.

He intends visiting England next year, when I am sure he and his music will be received as they so highly deserve.

Yours truly,

F. MENDELSSOHN-BARTHOLDY.

There must, however, have been ructions between them, because he writes to Klingemann :

TRANSLATION.

Leipsic, 31 Jan., 1847.

I shall not be able to give Madame Schumann's letter to you : Her husband has been behaving very doubtfully (zweideutig) (or more than that) to me, and has worked up an ugly business for me here, about which I shall not waste a word, but which has damnably (verdammt) cooled down my keenness to help him along and be civil to him.

Always yours,

FELIX.

The letter refers to Madame Schumann's first visit to London.

(To be continued.)

MUSINGS IN A LIBRARY.

IV.

There is a curious phenomenon in the world of music, the cause of which I must leave cleverer brains than mine to explain. This is the publication, from time to time, of new treatises or text-books on the Rudiments of Music. The publisher of each new work presents a copy to my library, and the consequence is that shelves upon shelves are filled with large and small volumes which are practically the same book written in the same words over and over again. Does each writer think that he has discovered or invented the alphabet and grammar of our art, or is he—as I fear—ignorant of the existence of all these anticipators of his wisdom? During the 19th century at least 500 books of 'Theory' were published in unmusical England alone, and the expense of their production was sheer waste. No one has said a new thing on the subject, nor said it in a new way. The only perceptible difference between one book and another is the tendency to brevity noticeable in all modern works. Our forefathers were heedless of the value of time, and wrote folio volumes where their descendants write octavos and even duodecimos. I have before me, for instance, the treatises of Choron, Reicha and Asiola, each as large as a family Bible, and a French publisher sends me the latest text-book adopted by the Paris Conservatoire, which is simply Choron cut down to about fifty pages of modest octavo.

Did I hear you say that this did not interest you in the least? Nay, but even so dreary a subject as Elements of Music has its entertaining side. Very few of the writers have ever attempted to make it lively, but those that have are worth our attention. And there are also some who are amusing without intending to be so.

Most of my readers have heard of the 'Plaine and Easie Introduction to Practicall Musicke' of Thomas Morley, though few may have perused it. This was the first treatise on music published in England, and the most practical, being set out in the form of a dialogue between a master and two of his pupils. I grieve to say that the first part, dealing with the Gam-ut and other mysteries, is too much for my poor brain to grasp, but Counterpoint, which forms the subject of Part II., is better expounded here than in any other book I know. The dialogues are full of a quaint humour, and the laudatory verses at the beginning (as we should print press notices) are immense. Here are a few samples :

... Wherein it seems that Orpheus he exceeds,

For he wyld beastes ; this, men with pleasure feeds.

A noyse did rise like thunder in my hearing ;

When in the East I saw dark clouds appearing :

Where Furies sat in Sable mantles couched,

Haughty disdain'd with cruell enuie matching

Olde Momus and young Zoltus all watching,

How to disgrace what Morley hath auouched.

But lo, the day Star with his bright beames shining ;

&c., &c.

The way in which the master finds endless fault with his pupils' work, and is then persuaded to show them how it ought to be done, whereupon they overload him with compliments, is very amusing ; but the book is full of wise sayings, e.g. :

Master : Pause much and you shall doe better.

Polimathes : What ! will much study helpe?

Mas. : Too much study dulthe the understanding ; but when I bid him pause much I will him to correct often before he leave.

Pol. : But when hee hath once set down a thing right, what need him study any more at that time?

Mas. : When he hath once set down a point, though it be right yet ought hee not to rest there but should rather looke more earnestly how he may bring it more artificially about. . . . And though the Lawyers say, that it were better to suffer a hundred guilty persons escape than to punish one guiltless, yet ought a musician rather blotte out twentie good points than to suffer one point passe in his compositions unartificially brought in.

Very different to this is Playford's 'Introduction to the Skill of Musick,' a work which goes over the same ground as Morley's, but does so in a ponderous and pedantic style, imitated, alas! by too many followers. The preface begins:

Musick in ancient Times was held in as great Estimation, Reverence and Honour, by the most Noble and Vertuous Persons, as any of the Liberal Sciences whatever, for the manifold Uses thereof conducing to the life of Man.

And so on, and so on, noting its great effect in encouraging 'Vertue' and dragging in the word 'Divine' on every opportunity. These 17th century writers all concurred in believing (or asserting) that a three-part Canon had a mystical connection with the Holy Trinity. This would be conceivable in a non-technical writer, but Elway Bevin (1631) in his 'Briefe and Short Introduction of the Art of Musicke' writes such a Canon, and then says:

A canon of three in one hath resemblance to the Holy Trinity, for as they are three distinct Persons and but one God, so are the other three distinct parts, comprehended in one. The leading part hath reference to the Father, the following part to the Sonne, the third to the Holy Ghost.

Unfortunately his three-part Canon (a weird affair) has a fourth part, or Canto Fermo. He does not explain whether this represents St. Peter or the Virgin Mary.

We of the present day have at least the good sense to avoid such naïve irreverences. But I have seen modern treatises in which the authors have lost themselves in transcendental speculations even as does one William Turner, writing somewhere about the year 1670:

The seven plain Degrees of Sound, may be said to bear an Allusion to the seven Planets, taking the Sun for the Center or Basis; and then the Earth comes in for its Share to make up an Eighth; as also, the dividing the eight Sounds into twelve Degrees, alludes to the twelve Constellations of the Zodiac. Here is a very great Mistery, which confounds all our Philosophy; and which Time will hardly, I believe, ever account for.

He is perfectly correct in his last expression of opinion.

A really amusing book, and more readable than Morley, is Mace's 'Musick's Monument,' a work also well-known by hearsay to the general reader. The book itself is rare and, strange to say, when encountered is generally found to lack the frontispiece, a well-engraved portrait of the author. There are three copies in this library, all in this defective condition. Mace was not only an enthusiastic musician, but rejoices in a unique literary style, the chief features of which are a wealth of epithet and invention of compound words, together with an inordinate use of italics and parenthetical sentences. Thus, speaking of the decline of art—for music seems to have begun to decline as early as 1676—he says:

But I remember what I said before, viz., That It is no Good Fashion to bring up a New, and cry down an Old, which is far Better.

Now I will suppose I hear it ask'd me, What is a far Better? why here I'll tell you.

And for your Information (Young Gentleman, or Young Lady), (for Young and Unskilful I must needs suppose you to be, who ask me such a Question; And 'tis much Pity of your want of Skill) Know, That in my Younger Time, we had Musick most Excellently Choice and most Eminently Rare; both for Its Excellency in Composition, Rare Fancy and Sprightly Ayre; as also for Its Proper and Fit Performances; even such, as (if your Young Tender Ears, and Fantacies, were but truly Tinctured therewith, and especially if it possibly could be cry'd up for the Mode or New Fashion) you would Embrace, for some Divine thing, . .

'Tis Great Pity they are so soon Forgotten and Neglected, as I perceive they are amongst so many.

A vast number of books on music, both ancient and modern, have been written by amateurs. Now the peculiarities of the amateur's book are, firstly, that it is all paste and scissors work, and, secondly, that though it may interest the reader he can never derive any mental nourishment from it. It always abounds in mythical anecdotes of the great composers or of 'the ancients,' such as the following: *

But what is told of the power of another musician, which was exercised on Henry the II., king of Denmark, called the good, is more extraordinary than all this; for it is said that by a movement and touch, calculated to excite choler, he inflamed the rage of that prince to such a degree, that he fell upon and put to death three or four of his domestics, and would have carried the havoc and devastation still further, if he had not been restrained by violence. This was the more wonderful, because the king's natural disposition was gentle and peaceable.

The author then adds to his offence by a foot-note:

The above accounts are recorded by so many authors that it seems needless to mention any particular one.

Exactly: history is made by the handing on of a lie from one credulous ignoramus to another.

There is one other early theory book which deserves mention. This is 'A Compleat Method for . . . Through Bass . . . by the late Famous Mr. GODFREY KELLER (1707).' This illiterate and confused work (about on a par with the Penny Vamper of to-day) was very popular in its time, and went through at least two editions. The text is engraved on copper, and only an actual excerpt can give an idea of it:

Of Natural Sixes.

Play Common Cords on all Notes where ye following Rules don't direct you otherwise.

The natural Sixes in a sharp key are on the half note below the key, the third above the key, and on all extraordinary sharp notes out of the key, if not to the contrary mark'd or prevented by Cadences.

The natural Sixes in a flat key are on the note below the key, the note above the key, and on all extraordinary sharp notes out of ye key, if not to the contrary mark'd or prevented by Cadences.

When the Bass either in a flat key, or a sharp key, Ascends or descends half a note, Sixes are proper on the first note falling on the second unless prevented by a Cadence.

When the Bass either in a flat or a sharp key, descends with a common cord by thirds, Sixes are proper on the falling thirds.

When the Bass either in a flat or a sharp key, Ascends with a common cord by thirds. Sixes are proper on the Rising thirds. In a flat key, the third above the key generally requires a Sixth to prepare ye Cadence, the fifth being repugnant to the half note below the key, Seldom two notes Ascends or descends but one of them hath a Sixth.

* Sketches of the origin, progress and effects of Music . . . by the Rev. Richard Eastcott, of Exeter (1793).

It may assist the bewildered modern reader to know that 'a flat key' is what we should call a minor key, and a 'sharp key' a major. This is all the assistance I can afford him towards a comprehension of Mr. Keller's language. At least I think we degenerate moderns have produced as useful text-books as this, though we do not go in for such tasty title-pages.

Occasional Notes.

The laying of the foundation-stone of the new home of the Royal Academy of Music marks an epoch in the history of one of our most important musical institutions, and a step in the advancement of the art in this country. The Academy has a history of which it may well be proud. It has experienced vicissitudes which it has borne with fortitude, and from which it has emerged with dignity and renewed strength. The mere fact that the Academy in these times of competition has not only held its own but continually of late years extended its usefulness, is a convincing testimony to its vitality and adaptability. Old students spread over the world will watch with sympathy and affectionate pride the future development of their Alma Mater now made possible by the energy and enterprise of the powers-that-be, who have shown themselves so worthy of their responsibility. An account of the proceedings at the ceremony will be found on p. 514.

The annual Conference of the Association of Musical Competition Festivals, which was held in London on July 14, revealed the fact that the movement has great vitality. About seventy festivals are listed on the Association's circular, but this list incompletely represents the influence and expansion of the movement. Wales, of course, has always had its Eisteddfodau (which are not noticed in the Association list), but now it is recorded that Scotland and Ireland, as well as England, are realising the stimulating and educative force of the movement. The widespread reports in the Press and, we may add, the publication of The Competition Festival Record, has fired emulation not only at home but abroad, as reports from the Colonies and the United States testify. An account of the meeting and of the papers read will be found in The Record, given as a supplement with our present issue.

The energy and optimism of Dr. Charles Harriss seem boundless. The formation of the Imperial Choir, might well have sufficed to give full vent to an 'ordinary individual's ambition, but side by side with this scheme he has launched another, almost dazzling in its boldness and certainly unprecedented in its comprehensiveness. He has arranged to take Dr. Coward and a picked choir of 200 voices on a concert tour through Canada to Australia, New Zealand and South Africa. In every town to be visited the English choir will, for some of their work, join with local choral and orchestral bodies, and thus show a spirit of amity and brotherhood. The tour will take place in 1911, and will occupy six months. The arrangements are necessarily of the most elaborate description, and they appear to have been thought out with the special skill derived from an exceptional experience of ways and means. Dr. Charles Harriss left for South Africa on July 16, in order to complete the arrangements at the Cape. He will return to London in September.

Another missionary enterprise deserves mention in connection with the above. The famous Sheffield Union Choir, which is Dr. Coward's own choir, and is an organization quite independent of the Sheffield Festival with which Dr. Coward's name is associated, will visit Germany in September this year for the purpose of giving a series of concerts in Aix-la-Chapelle, Düsseldorf, Essen, Leipzig and Dresden. The programme will include 'The Dream of Gerontius,' 'Israel in Egypt' (selections), Bach's motet 'Sing ye,' 'Messiah' (selections), and some unaccompanied music. The tour will commence on September 24 and conclude on October 3.

In the July Nineteenth Century, Mr. Edward D. Rendall contributes an article under the suggestive and apparently sarcastic title, 'A plea for the introduction of music among the upper classes.' But although the implication of the title is startling and perhaps far-fetched, it is evident that Mr. Rendall is in deadly earnest. His contention is that the young of the aristocracy and upper classes generally are not so well cared for musically as are the children of the middle and lower classes. In contrasting the educational aims and ideals of the Board (now, by the way, Council) Schools with those of the well-known public schools, he quotes Mr. A. C. Benson, 'that mouthpiece of enlightened education,' as saying :

One desires, then, that boys should arrive at some comprehension of the conditions of modern life, of their own place in the world ; and to do this some knowledge of science, of history, of geography, and of modern languages and literature is essential ; they must also be prepared to earn a living, and to do this a real working knowledge of their own language, of simple mathematics, and of at least one modern language is, to say the least, highly desirable. This is a heavy programme.

Mr. Rendall does not ascribe much importance to the practice of chants and hymn-tunes and the piano-forte, which is more or less common in schools for the upper classes. He puts his faith in the development of musical capacity through singing, which, he says :

Is the only natural means of expressing musical feeling, because such reading requires concentration of mind and implies a discipline of the utmost value ; also because it makes the practice of choral singing possible, and this is almost the only direct means of teaching unanimity of feeling among masses of human beings ; and, lastly, because the daily use of such exercises is the best way of realising the traditional function of art, which is to soften and control those barbarous elements in boys' character which are especially in evidence in the Anglo-Saxon race.

He complains rather bitterly that skill in music gets no marks in the examinations now, the preparation for which is an indispensable feature in the public school boy's life. Further, he makes the old charge that music is neglected in the preparatory schools, although he does not blame the teachers, who have to bow to the system or perish. Mr. Rendall admits that there are evidences of musical progress in the well-known public schools, but this does not yield to him much comfort. Although we have no doubt that music as a factor in education does not receive the attention it deserves in schools of the type criticised, we think Mr. Rendall is somewhat unduly pessimistic, and then he deals with the education of only one sex. The eternal feminine deserves some consideration.

The folk-music of Southern Nigeria was dealt with by Mr. Northcote Thomas in a deeply interesting lecture given by him at the Royal United Service Institution on July 16. It appears that in this far-away land music is a means of expression throughout life, just as it is in more civilized communities. In Nigeria, too, as elsewhere, music and dance are closely associated and re-act upon one another. The songs express a wide range of emotion, and are often much elaborated. In view of the fact that many of the melodies cannot be expressed in European musical notation, it was a priceless advantage to Mr. Thomas in his investigations that he was able to employ the phonograph. The instruments used by the natives are drums, bells, a small kind of guitar, a musical bow which is played with two sticks, and a flute. An extraordinary fact about the Nigerian songs is that they are sung in a rude harmony. This practice obtains mostly in the songs sung by the Oria, a secret society of men. It is stated that these songs are the most beautifully harmonized of all. Mr. Thomas has discovered enough about Nigeria to make students of folk-music desire to know a great deal more.

A recent number of the 'Monthly Journal of the International Musical Society' contains an interesting article on Schumann's 'Genoveva,' by Hermann Abert. In the latter part he calls attention to the use of representative themes in that work, and expresses surprise that no one has treated this point systematically. He considers that Schumann's organic treatment of themes shows an advance on the use which Wagner made of his in 'Tannhäuser.' It must, however, be remembered that Schumann was acquainted with 'Lohengrin,' in which Wagner also made an advance of the same kind. The three illustrations given by Abert show clearly that Schumann was working on representative theme lines, although, as the writer states, not in the plastic, forcible style of Wagner. He, however, points to one or two passages in which the themes are not logically introduced. Of the first of the two bold themes which he quotes, he remarks that it is to be found in 'Tristan,' namely:

but Schumann had gone to his rest long before that music-drama was written. May not that theme have been suggested to him by the one to the words 'Nie sollst du mich befragen' in 'Lohengrin'?

Thirty-three girls of the Manchester Ancoats Mill Street Institute Choir, under their conductor, Miss Say Ashworth, left on July 29 for Switzerland, where they are to give two (and perhaps three) concerts on the Kurplatz at Lucerne, in conjunction with the orchestra, and on August 6 they are to sing at the Interlaken Kursaal. Each girl has contributed out of her earnings two guineas towards the expenses, and in addition will lose a fortnight's wages. With orchestral accompaniment they will give Berlioz's 'Ophelia' ballad from the 'Tristia,' Schubert's 23rd Psalm, Elgar's 'Fly, singing bird' and 'The Snow,' along with numerous items of a cappella work.

THE VEIL.

DR. COWEN'S NEW CHORAL WORK FOR THE CARDIFF FESTIVAL, SEPTEMBER, 1910.

The title and motto of the second section of Part II. is as follows:

II. THE SOUL AND THE DWELLING.

*A House miraculous of breath
The royal Soul inhabiteth.
Alone therein for evermore,
It seeks in vain to pass the door;
But through the windows of the eyne
Signalles to its kin divine.*

The words at first brood somewhat mystically over the relations of soul and body, and are presented in a soprano and tenor duet of considerable development, displaying much charm and tenderness and occasional ecstasy. In the poem the words are described as 'A song Orm sang of old, to Oora with the locks of gold'

Ours are two dwellings,
Wondrously beautiful,
Made in the darkness
Of soft-tinted flesh:
In the one dwelling,
Prison'd I dwell,
And lo! from the other
Thou becomest me!
I am a Soul!

The duet flows into a solemn and placid movement, the gravity of which is accentuated by its unusual but finely appropriate tone-colour. For some time it is written for two soli contralti, baritone and tenor, and C.T.B. chorus. The soli soprano and tenor then re-enter, and sopranos are added to the chorus. The music is very simple and flowing. An entry of the chorus, again minus sopranos, to the words

Be not afraid, my Soul,
To leave thy Mate at last,

is very striking. The soloists answer

But put her gently down
In the earth beneath thy feet.

And it shall be well for thee
In the beautiful Master's sight,
If it be found in the end
Thou hast used her tenderly.

The words

My Soul, thou art wed
To a perishable thing

Is it not wondrous,
The beautiful, mystical
House of the Soul!

set for chorus and soloists bring Part II. to a tranquil conclusion.

All through this number there is a throb of infinite tenderness, and a mood of joy blended with reverence at the thought of the 'beautiful Master.'

Part III. deals reflectively and very intimately with the awesome feelings inspired by the great mystery of existence. The title and motto of the first section are as follows:

I. SONGS OF SEEKING.

*'Songs of Seeking, day by day,
Sung while wearying on the way,—
Feeble cries of one who knows
Nor whence he comes, nor whither goes.
Yet of his own free will doth wear
The bloody Cross of those who fare
Upward and on, in sad accord,
The footsore Seekers of the Lord.'*

An ominous, agitated instrumental introduction leads to a solo by The Seeker (baritone). He first dwells on the beauty of the world—'God's green world'—and is calmly joyous:

Sweet it is to sit in leafy Forests,
And hear the stirring of strange breaths
In the branches.

The seasons are sung of in turn, the orchestra meanwhile significantly supporting with constantly varying texture the fancifulness of the poem. Then ensues the arresting thought:

Yet evermore a trouble doth pursue me—
A hunger for the welfare of my being.

Then with some dread the Seeker exclaims:

I speed for ever
From the mystic shape
That my life projects
And my soul perceives:

Will thy wrath pursue me,
Because I cannot Escape the shadow
Of the thing I am?

With bitterness he cries

I sadden in the sad things of the World,
Yet crying, 'Wherefore are men bruised and beaten?
Whence do I grieve and gladden to no end?'

A climax of anguish is reached at the words:

No. 13.
a tempo maestoso. ♩ = 60.

and then comes a deep yearning:

Wherefore, O wherefore art Thou veil'd and hidden?

The mood softens, when the Seeker exclaims

At last in a garden of God
I saw the Flower of the World.

The chorus take up the strain, and in eight parts with gradually increasing intensity reach great exaltation:

O wonderful Spirit divine!
That walkest the garden unseen,
Come hither, and bless, ere it dies,
The beautiful Flower of the World.

After the choral climax the Seeker alone continues his appeal:

Unfold to me the image of Thy features,
Come down upon my heart, that I may know Thee!

and the music leads into the next and final section, which has for its title 'The Lifting of the Veil.' The opening words are assigned to the chorus, and are treated in a novel and impressive way:

No. 14. CHORUS. (Spoken in a low, mysterious voice.)
ALTOS AND BASSES. pp

A terror now seizes mankind. Then the Seeker awakes :

I awoke—and, rising,
My soul look'd forth—
The Dawn was glimmering,
All silver pale
And slowly fading
With a mystic tremor
The Lights gleam'd beautiful
In the wondrous Veil !

No. 15. SOPRANO SOLO.
Molto sostenuto. poco rall.

O Shad-ows, be at peace, . . for ye shall rest.

a tempo.

Ped.

Hope, resignation, and comfort are now the moods, and soloists and chorus sing rapturously of the :

Rainbow of promise ! Colour, Light, and Soul !
Touching forlornest places with its tints,
Fringing the clouds with flowers of crimson fire,
And melting, melting far away,
Yonder ! upon the dimmest peak of Heav'n.

The music gets softer and slower, and gradually dies away to the words :

No. 16. SOPRANO SOLO.

melt . . . ing,

CHORUS. SOPRANO.

and in this ineffable mood the work concludes.

'The Veil' takes a little more than an hour and a half to perform. The principal soloists required are soprano, contralto, tenor and baritone, and there are smaller parts for a second contralto and a second tenor. There is ample opportunity for the chorus.

The work will be produced at the Cardiff Festival on September 20. The principal soloists will be Miss Agnes Nicholls, Madame Kirkby Lunn, Mr. Walter Hyde and Mr. Herbert Brown. The composer will conduct.

The series of lectures which Mr. Sydney Grew has delivered at the Birmingham and Midland Institute concluded on June 23, when his subject was 'Modern composers for the pianoforte.' Among foreign composers, Mr. Grew picked out Macdowell and Reger for special consideration, and made passing references to the French and Finnish schools. He gave his chief attention, however, to the pianoforte works of young living British composers, in which he saw hopeful signs for the future. A performance of Mr. B. J. Dale's fine Sonata in D minor was given at the conclusion.

ON VARIED HYMN ACCOMPANIMENT.

BY WALTER G. ALCOCK.

There are occasions when a verse of a hymn-tune sung in unison may produce an exceedingly fine effect, particularly if the organist take the opportunity of varying the harmonies. Much, of course, depends upon the possibilities offered by the tune, and some tunes are naturally better adapted than others to harmonic change. The point to remember is that chromatic harmony is not always the most suitable, and that a more subtle effect is gained by a judicious observance of the tonality suggested and the character of the words.

It is proposed to give a few examples which might possibly be of use to those organists who, though wishing to obtain variety, may not have examined the capabilities of the tune sung.

The 'Old Hundredth' offers an excellent opportunity, as the following will show. In the fourth chord of the last line the G natural in the bass is very effective:

Another tune which admits of even greater change is 'Veni Emmanuel.' As it is in the Æolian mode, transposed to E, our harmonies should be formed strictly of notes included in that scale. It will be noticed that the seventh is flat throughout, and that there are no accidentals. In the first part the tune will be played upon pedal-stops of 8-ft. pitch, with necessarily different harmony. At the words 'Rejoice, rejoice,' the 16-ft. pedal enters effectively with entirely free, if modal, harmonies:

The tune 'St. Ann' is effective if not too greatly altered:

Dr. W. H. Monk's fine tune 'Evelyns' well lends itself to embellishment, to which the long notes at the end of some of the lines afford opportunity for continuing the harmonic scheme:

(By permission of the Proprietors of 'Hymns Ancient and Modern'.)

The tune 'Nun Danket' is probably as suitable as any for varied harmony :

The following splendid tune by Orlando Gibbons (though not in the 'A. and M.' collection) is included as an example of the development suggested by its broad, diatonic phrases. The harmonies were arranged by the writer and played by him during the unison verse sung at the Gibbons commemoration service in Westminster Abbey in 1907. The points of imitation will be noticed :

THE SYMPHONIC POEM BEFORE LISZT.

BY HERBERT ANTCLIFFE.

Aristocrat in taste and feeling, and with a fine despite of all commercialism and the bourgeoisie who exercised it, Franz Liszt was nevertheless in his art essentially a utilitarian. There was nothing he did or omitted to do but was calculated to a nicety to serve his purposes. These conflicting qualities are shown quite clearly in his invention of the form and title of the symphonic poem. No one knew better than he did that he was simply adapting to his purposes the means employed by his predecessors for expressing emotions and facts not primarily within the province of music, and it was with a definite purpose that in going a step further than others had done he allowed himself to be set up as the inventor of a new form. He certainly was the inventor, in so far that he gathered up the threads of other men's work and placed them together in a tangible whole. He was not, however, ignorant of the fact that this, and the giving of a name and a scope for the method of announcing the association of inspiring motive and resultant expression, was the full extent of his invention. Weber's 'Concertstück' was not the only work which had appeared in anything like the form and nature of those which Liszt put forward under the title of Symphonic poem, and we have to go no further back than Mendelssohn's 'Calm sea and a prosperous voyage' overture to find a definite tone-poem conceived and developed on much the same lines as those of Liszt, and not improbably the immediate artistic inspiration of those works. Liszt was exceptionally late in developing his creative faculties, and although in middle life at the time when he wrote these works, he was still in his imitative period. This does not at all impair the fact that they were also the outcome of his previous work (particularly his song-transcriptions) and of his strong literary tastes and inclinations. Rather, one statement strengthens the other.

But we must not be misled into the idea that the beginning of programme music was the beginning of the symphonic poem. Programme music had achieved considerable success before the symphonic poem in its most elementary and embryonic form made its appearance. It was known long before works of symphonic nature and dimensions were possible, and in spite of certain attempts in that direction and indications of such a genus being possible, we cannot claim the title for any work which was composed before the period of Beethoven and Weber. With the latter, however, we may fairly say that works of the class to which Liszt gave the name appeared. They were still issued under the titles of the older forms, and were not dissociated from them in structural principle, but the motive power and its expression were of the character which brought into being the new form.

Before we go any further, it may be well to accept a definition of the term 'Symphonic poem,' based upon what was evidently intended by Liszt, and what his successors and the ordinary musician of to-day understand by the term. It is, then, an orchestral work the dimensions of which, as well as its quality, entitle it to rank with other works of the highest importance, and the inspiration and intention of which are outside the scope of mere formal design.

It will be seen that this does not insist in any way upon the necessity for the work being developed throughout from one set of themes, nor does it exclude works in which the composer expresses himself most naturally and clearly in classical forms, so long as his aim is not a mere putting together of certain musical sounds in such forms. To do so would be to exclude several of Liszt's own works to which he gave the title, and also a large number of works of his most ardent and able disciples which are generally regarded as coming under the designation.

The application of this definition will, as I have said, take us back to Weber's 'Concertstück,' to the same composer's 'Oberon' overture, to Beethoven's 'Battle of Vittoria,' the Ninth Symphony, and possibly also to the 'Eroica' and the 'Pastoral.' It does not, however, include the C minor, in spite of its poetical ideas, or the famous quartet 'Es muss sein,' as the intention of those works was primarily to carry out a musical design rather than to express anything extraneous to the music, and the indications of programmatic ideas were added as an after-thought. With Mendelssohn, Berlioz and Sterndale Bennett we get more of the spirit which inspired Liszt himself.

It must of course be remembered that before Liszt few composers wrote, or attempted to write, pure programme music, and consequently we must always regard the most advanced works of this nature as still belonging to the earlier methods and forms. Richard Wagner credited Weber with 'the invention of a new kind of music, "the dramatic fantasia," of which the Overture of "Oberon" is one of the noblest examples.' It might well be asked in this connection what is the difference between a 'dramatic fantasia' and a 'symphonic poem.' The only possible answer to this is that the difference is practically the same as between a drama, or a dramatic work of any dimensions, in words and a poem of any description. The former is restricted to a somewhat narrow form and expression, while the latter is wider in its application and may include dramatic, lyric, elegiac, and any other poetical form. While the former cannot comprise the latter, the latter can, and frequently does, comprise the former.

The first attempts at anything of the kind were made when orchestral music was still in its earliest infancy—in Italy, the country where melody alone has always been considered of higher importance than it is in other countries! Antonio Vivaldi, whose reputation to-day rests mainly on the inspiration his works afforded to J. S. Bach, but who was a really great master of form, and also one of the first to write orchestral accompaniments in his concertos, was the composer of a series of concertos which he called 'Le quattro stagioni, ovvero il Cimento dell' armonia e dell' invenzione in 12 concerti a quattro e cinque' ('The Four Seasons, or the Trial of Harmony and Invention in twelve concertos,' &c.). Generally speaking, however, this kind of music was confined to instrumental solos, and chiefly to music written for the clavier instruments, and we get no orchestral music worthy of consideration in this respect until we reach the works of Beethoven and Weber.

In spite of Beethoven's position, apart from his sheer creative genius, as the one who did more than any other individual to establish what we term the classical forms, and particularly the sonata form, several of his works are undeniably symphonic poems, in the strictest interpretation of the definition we have given. This applies particularly to the 'Choral symphony,' which is confessedly the result of a desire to transcribe into musical terms the sentiments of Schiller's poem. Its freedom from the restraint of conventional form has rarely, if ever, been exceeded by the most advanced of modern programme writers, and it was only by his mastery of abstract form rather than of individual forms that the composer was able to use this freedom successfully. It would be impossible for anyone else to write another work in the same form except with the same intention, and no one would think of attempting to define the form in which it is written, or of justifying its structure by applying the rules upon which his earlier works are based. This fact, combined with that of its inspiration being directly attributable to a literary source, makes it possible to say that the greatest symphonic poem, probably of all time, was completed twenty years or more before the title was invented or a separate art form suggested by Liszt.

The desire to express in brief the main features and characteristics of an opera or drama in the overture which preceded it resulted in the 'dramatic fantasias' of Weber and Wagner, which took the beginnings of the form outside the isolated examples of an occasional world-genius, and placed the development on the line of the least resistance.

With Berlioz the desire for the reform and extension of the bounds of musical structure became more evidently expressed, though the eccentricities of this composer and his lack of self-control took him more or less out of the line followed by the men of stronger and better balanced powers, and made his expression of such desire less clearly articulate. The conjunction of poetic extravagance with outward conformity to the outlines of the classic forms, brings his work more into line with the early attempts at programme music than with any efforts towards the reform of structural principles. Had he been as great a master of form as he was of orchestration his works would have been the greatest contribution to the progress of musical form in the 19th century. As it is, the works of Berlioz as a whole make an interesting episode rather than create an epoch in the history of that progress, in spite of the fact that a number of them are undoubtedly symphonic poems. Or perhaps it would be more correct to say that they are a contribution to the development of programme music alone, without aiding the discovery or creation of a form or series of forms in which its expression can best be contained.

Spohr stands somewhat in the same position in this respect, though without the power or feeling for definite programme-writing which Berlioz possessed. His fourth ('Die Weihe der Toene'), seventh ('Irdisches und Gottliches im Menschenleben'), and last ('The four seasons') symphonies are not altogether successful attempts to write symphonic poems, while his overture to 'Faust' more successfully embodies the early principles of the form, and may be classed under the designation given by Wagner to Weber's overtures.

'Faust' seems to have been the inspiring force of quite a number of attempts in this direction. Of these, however, only Spohr's and Wagner's overtures and Liszt's own symphony come within the period we are now considering. The two latter, and of these two particularly Wagner's work, are distinctly orchestral tone poems of the highest type, in which the emotional content, while deciding and making the form of the work, is not allowed to run riot with the ground principles of tonal structure. After the 'Choral symphony' they are the strongest and most sane of those works which both indicated and assisted the trend of feeling which existed in the period to which they belong.

The delicate suggestiveness of Mendelssohn's and Sterndale Bennett's overtures would bring these works more into line with our subject if they were more extended in their dimensions. They were, however, distinctly tone-poems of a highly elaborate type, and led on definitely, even if they were not, as I have suggested, the direct musical inspiration of Liszt's works. With these closes the older period of programme and programmatic music, after which could only come the more direct methods of Liszt and Wagner and their successors.

THE IRISH ORIGIN OF SOME 'ENGLISH' COUNTRY DANCE-TUNES.

BY W. H. GRATTAN-FLOOD, MUS.D.

For some seven or eight years past the cult of folk-music has been making vast strides in England and numerous publications have been issued of 'traditional English tunes.' In looking through some of these recent issues I was struck by the fact that many of the airs were really Irish. On this account it may be well to put before the readers of the Musical Times some facts relative to the Irish origin of a number of country dance-tunes that are regarded as English. I do this in no partisan spirit but merely as a matter of justice, and to vindicate Ireland's claim to some airs the provenance of which is beyond any question.

To those who have studied the subject, it will not be anything new to mention the popularity of Irish dance-tunes in England at the close of the 16th century. The skirl of the Irish pipes, played by the leaders of the Irish Kerne who went to fight for Henry VIII. at Boulogne, was heard in London in May, 1544. Queen Elizabeth learned the Irish harp, and even the Irish language, as is evident from the State Papers. An Irish Jesuit, Father William Bathe (author of the first printed English treatise on music), presented her with a new harp of his own make, and Sir Christopher Nugent, Baron of Delvin, wrote an Irish Primer for her Majesty in 1582-3. The English country dance, or 'Long dance for as many as will,' was the Irish Rinnce Fada (Long Dance), and we find reference to the Irish Heys in 1588. The Faddy or Furry Dance—still danced on May 8, at Helston, in Cornwall—is a survival of the Irish Rinnce Fada. Dauncy and Chappell admit the Irish origin of Sir Roger de Coverley: its old name was 'Dunboyne,' and Fynes Moryson saw it danced in Ireland in 1603. Queen Elizabeth herself, in 1602, took a distinct fancy to Irish dance-tunes, and in the Talbot Papers, under date of September 19, 1602, the Earl of Worcester writes to the Earl of Shrewsbury: 'We are frolic here in Court; much dancing in the Privy Chamber of country dances before the Queen's Majesty, who is exceedingly pleased therewith. Irish tunes are at this time most pleasing.' Shakespeare alludes to ten Irish tunes (see my 'History of Irish Music').

Under King James, Irish music was in vogue at Court, and the Queen kept an Irish harper, Donal dubh O'Cahill, who subsequently entered the service of the Earl of Cork. Prince Henry's music-master, from 1608 to 1611, was an Irishman, Walter Quin, of Dublin, whose son, James Quin, M.A., was a fine bass singer at Oxford. Playford's Dancing Master, from 1651 to 1720, contains dozens of fine Irish dance-tunes, and thus may be traced the vogue of these imported Irish airs in England, with the result that they have been claimed as 'English.'

Henry Purcell adapted two Irish airs, one of which is the well-known 'Lillibullero.' Thomas Doggett, the Irish actor, introduced several Irish dance-tunes into his 'Country Wake,' afterwards altered to the ballad-opera of 'Flora.' Irish dance-tunes are to be found in the 'Beggar's Opera,' 'Beggar's Wedding,' 'Polly,' and in the many ballad operas that were produced in the years 1728-1738. They were also introduced into most of the musical plays of the mid-eighteenth century.

'Drops of brandy,' 'Ballinamona,' 'Rakes of Mallow,' 'Soldier's joy,' 'The parson in his boots,' 'Larry Grogan,' 'The peacock,' 'Johnny Magill,' 'The dandy,' 'Jackson's morning brush,' 'Langlee,' 'The drummer,' 'Captain O'Kane,' 'New Langlee,' 'The captain with his whiskers,' 'Peggy of Derby,' 'Ally Croker,' 'Captain Magan,' 'The black joke,'

'Buff coat,' 'Saturday night,' 'Petticoat loose,' 'The hare in the corn,' 'Molly Roe,' 'The geese in the bog,' 'The kettle-bender' and others I could name, are all Irish.

'Nancy Dawson' is invariably regarded as an English dance-tune, but it is certainly Irish, and was printed under another title in 1750. The song in honour of the fair and frail Nancy was not written till October, 1759, and was set to the Irish hornpipe which Miss Dawson danced in the 'Beggars Opera' at Covent Garden. I have a copy of the 1750 Irish hornpipe, and also of the setting in 1760 as 'Miss Dawson's hornpipe.'

'Brighton Camp' only dates from about the year 1785 or 1790, but the Irish air to which it was adapted was set to an Irish song 'Spailpin Fanach' previously. There is another Irish song set to this air in 'Paddy's Resource,' a song-book printed at Belfast in 1795.

'Speed the plough' was composed by an Irishman, John Moorehead, who was leader of the orchestra in the Manchester Theatre in 1793. It was introduced by him into his own musical piece of the 'Narul Pillar,' produced on October 7, 1799, and became so enormously popular that it was taken for the title of his next musical piece, 'Speed the plough,' given on February 8, 1800.

'Paddy Carey' and 'Darby Kelly' are both Irish, though frequently claimed as English. Andrew Cherry, an Irishman, set words to the former Irish jig-tune, while Thomas Dibdin, an Englishman, adapted verses to the well-known Irish lilt for an Irish comedian called Paddy Webb, in 1811. 'Haste to the Wedding' is also an Irish tune, although it is frequently quoted as 'English.' Another name for it is 'A trip to the Dargle.'

I have seen 'Garryowen' included in an English collection, though it is unquestionably Irish. An early printed copy is dated 1796. Three years later it was introduced by James Byrne, an Irishman, into the pantomime of 'Harlequin Amulet' at Drury Lane, and at once caught on. In the 'Memoirs of Grimaldi' we read that in 1799 this same James Byrne in 'Harlequin Amulet' changed the traditional dress of Harlequin to a 'neatly fitting white silk shape, into which the parti-coloured diamonds were deftly woven after receiving a lavish sprinkling of spangles.' Here I pause for the present.

CARILLON RECITALS AT MALINES.

A most interesting brochure has recently been issued containing the whole of the programmes of the carillon recitals to be given during the year by M. Josef Denyn—the famous carillonneur—at Malines. The information is printed in four languages—English, French, Flemish, and German—and the booklet contains, in addition to the programmes, particulars of the important items of interest in the delightful old city of Malines, together with maps (town plan and railway) and eight illustrations. The carillon—which is one of the finest in the world—has a compass of four octaves, and consists of no less than forty-five bells—the largest weighing nearly eight tons and the smallest but a few pounds—made by such great masters of bell founding as Peter Hemony, Dumery, Waghevens, Van den Gheyn, &c.

The programmes include Sonatas, Preludes, selections from grand opera, and representative folk-songs of all nations. The music is of real worth, and includes compositions of Bach, Chopin, Arne, Rossini, Schubert, Van den Gheyn, Gounod, Nicolai, Schumann, &c.

This little guide will be most acceptable to those who are fortunate enough to avail themselves of the opportunity of hearing one of the most delightful and unique performances in Europe.

Malines is so easily accessible to all who go to the Continent, via Ostend and Brussels, that it is surprising that more who are on holiday bent do not visit such an interesting old-world city.

The great feature, however, of the present year will be the International Concours de Carillonneurs—professional and amateur—which is to take place on August 21 and 22. There will be upwards of twenty competitors, all well-known carillonneurs from the following places: The Hague, Gouda, Utrecht, Leyden, Nymegen, Louvain, Courtrai, S. Hertogenbosch, Mons, Turnhout, Lier, Aalst, Oudenaerde, St. Niklaas, St. Truiden, Diest, &c. Each competitor will be required to play two pieces of his own selection, and a test-piece specially written for the occasion. The competitors for the Prize of Honour on the second day will be chosen from the successful candidates of the first day. The adjudicators specially appointed are Messrs. W. W. Starmer (of Tunbridge Wells), Jef Denyn, Cyriel Verelst, and Van Doorslaer.

As such an international competition is a rare event (the last was held thirteen years ago), the occasion will be of the greatest interest. As a conclusion to the festival, M. Denyn, the official carillonneur of the city of Malines, will give a recital, between the pieces of which interludes and fanfares will be played by a band of trumpets and horns stationed at the top of the tower, which is 324 feet high.

The adjudicators are to be entertained by the Municipality, and a memento of the festival publicly presented to each of them. The occasion will be one of a lifetime, and all who happen to be in the neighbourhood will do well to spend two days at Malines to hear the competitions and the delightful recital of Josef Denyn.

MANITOBA SCHOOL TEACHERS IN LONDON.

Under the auspices of the Provincial Education Department, about 160 Manitoba school teachers are on a visit to this country, partly on holiday and partly to inquire into our educational ways and means. The party arrived on July 16, and will stay about six weeks, during which they propose to visit many of the large towns. Many receptions have been arranged in their honour. One of the first was that given by Messrs. Novello in their music room on the evening of July 19. A musical programme was provided under the direction of Dr. McNaught. A first rate children's choir, consisting of twelve boys from Mr. James Bates's School for Choristers, and twelve girls from the Burlington Girls' School, Old Burlington Street (by permission of the head-mistress, Miss Wigg), also pupils of Mr. Bates, was a welcome feature of the first part of the entertainment. Miss Elsie Horne played pianoforte solos in her best style, and Miss Kay sang a selection of Somersetshire folk-songs. These were all highly appreciated by the guests, but perhaps they were even more interested in a set of Morris Dances, presented by students of the Chelsea Physical Training College, under the skilled and experienced direction of Mr. Cecil Sharp.

Mr. Alfred H. Littleton gave the visitors a warm welcome on behalf of the firm, and Dr. McNaught also greeted them on behalf of all interested in school music. Short addresses were delivered by Mr. James Bates and Dr. Hulbert, explaining the principles on which they work in connection with the production of vocal tone. These practical lessons were eagerly followed by the company. Dr. Borland also spoke on the musical work of London schools, and a cordial letter from Dr. Charles Harriss was read. The refreshment of mind and soul was followed by some substantial refreshment of the body, and the guests separated in happy mood shortly before midnight.

The party, which consists mostly of ladies, is under the charge of Mr. F. Ney, of Winnipeg, and, whilst in London, of Mr. Gautrey, of the London Teachers' Association. It is stated that one of the objects of the visit is to bring the people in Manitoba into closer touch and communication with the Motherland through the medium of the greatest factor of Empire—the schoolroom.

Church and Organ Music.

LIVERPOOL CATHEDRAL.

On June 29, St. Peter's Day, the seal was set to the undertaking of building a cathedral for Liverpool, by the consecration of the first completed portion of the great building, viz., the Lady Chapel. At this memorable ceremony the Lord Bishop, Dr. Chavasse, was assisted by the Archbishops of York and Dublin, and twenty-three bishops. Headed by the Earl of Derby and the Lord Mayor, with the civic regalia, there was a congregation of some five hundred, representative of the great body of churchmen and churchwomen in this diocese who are offering this striking evidence of a living faith, in a building which will be an inspiration and encouragement to the national church as well as to the citizens of Liverpool. To judge by the beauty of the Lady Chapel, which the genius of Mr. G. Gilbert Scott has called into being, the main building of the great cathedral, when completed, will no doubt be equally remarkable for nobility and symmetry of design as well as for hugeness of dimensions. Built of local red sandstone, the architect describes the style of the chapel as a free interpretation of 14th century Gothic.

The Lady Chapel consists of a stone-vaulted nave and a chancel nearly sixty feet in height, which terminates in an apse. The floor is some fourteen feet below that of the cathedral, and the triforium of the chapel, which runs round the interior of the building, is on the same level as, and in direct communication with, the cathedral itself. The arcade is in two stages, the lower of which supports the gallery or triforium while the upper stage rises to the vaulting of the roof fifty-eight feet from the floor. Above the triforium rise the fourteen pointed windows with distinctive tracery, each of which is filled with stained glass forming a pictorial chronicle of the deeds of good women. Except the Child Christ and the Magi in the central apse window, all the figures are those of women. The floor of the chapel is composed of large squares of green and white marble, relieved by a scheme of panels of black and white inlay, and the space will accommodate from 300 to 400 worshippers. The cost is about £60,000, which has been chiefly borne by two Liverpool families, the Langtons and Earles (of which latter family Mr. Hamilton Earle, the singer, is a member). Numerous memorial gifts have been made, which include the reredos (a gorgeous triptych of gilt carving on a blue ground, designed by the late G. F. Bodley), organ, flooring, windows, furniture and fittings. The organ-balcony, at what is relatively the west end—the building being placed north and south—is on a level with the parapet of the triforium, a considerable height above the chapel floor, where the choir stalls are located. The chapel is lighted by six magnificent pendants for electric lights with twelve lamps in each. These are suspended by long chains from the vaulting, and are of gilded wrought-iron with rich details of 'tabernacle' work. The same beauty of workmanship and ingenuity of design appears in all the stone and wood-carving and in the ironwork. All the oak doors are embellished with elaborate forged-iron hinges and lock-plates, while many of the handles have on them grotesque animals of a mediæval character.

The organ, a two-manual instrument, blown by a two and a-half h.p. electric motor, bears the following builders' label:

'Hoc organum adificatum est per Henry Willis and Sons,
Per aures ad animam.'

It fully sustains the reputation of its well-known builders, both in tone-features and mechanical equipment. The tone of the diapasons and pedal organ is rich and weighty. The addition of a clarinet stop would make the scheme as complete as it is effective.

The specification of the organ is as follows:

GREAT.
	Feet.		Feet.
Double stopped diapason	.. 16	Principal 4

Eight wind reservoirs, in addition to the main reservoir. Action, tubular-pneumatic, on the Willis pressure system.

Compass of manuals, CC to C''.

Compass of pedals, CC to F.

There are also adjustable combinations by switchboards placed at both sides of organ.

The consecration ceremony was marked by dignified and impressive simplicity. Preceded by Dr. Chavasse, Bishop of Liverpool, the long procession of bishops in their vocation robes, with the Archbishop of York in the rear, arrived outside the chapel, singing the hymn 'Blessed City, Heavenly Salem.' At its conclusion the Bishop knocked upon the closed door with his pastoral staff, and on entering the chapel received the petition for consecration presented by the Earl of Derby, who wore his robes as Chancellor of Liverpool University. During the procession of the prelates and other dignitaries to their places in the chancel, Psalm xxiv. was chanted by the choir, followed by 'Veni Creator Spiritus,' sung to Dr. Dykes's tune. This was followed by an impressive series of prayers, and separate consecrations of the lectern, the place of marriage, the place of confirmation, and the holy table. The Sentence of Consecration was then read by the chancellor and signed by the Bishop. The remainder of the music included Sterndale Bennett's 'God is a Spirit' (unaccompanied), 'Christ is our cornerstone,' to S. S. Wesley's tune 'Harewood,' a hymn by Whittier (written for the opening of Plymouth Church, St. Paul, Minnesota), and Dr. Harford Lloyd's anthem 'Who am I, and what is my people,' written for the Consecration of Truro Cathedral in 1887.

It was noticeable that no specially-written music marked the occasion. In its absence the effective three-fold Amen, composed by Mr. F. H. Burstall, the Cathedral organist, who presided at the organ, was agreeably representative of local talent. It was beautifully sung by the highly-efficient Cathedral choir. On this occasion there was no opportunity for utilising the services of the Liverpool Church Choir Association, as was done at the foundation stone-laying ceremony when his late Majesty King Edward VII. was present. Their turn will come when the great choir building is consecrated. The sermon was preached by the Archbishop of York, whose text was 'The Lord is in His Holy Temple, let the whole earth keep silence before Him,' and the offertory of £382 was devoted to the Cathedral Services Maintenance Fund.

TRURO CATHEDRAL.

The Benediction of the western towers, spires, and bells of the now completed Cathedral Church of Truro, gave opportunity for the solemn dignity of church music to fulfil its proper function as the handmaid of religion. The choir from the adjoining diocese of Exeter, conducted by Dr. D. J. Wood, showed practical sympathy by taking a long journey for the purpose of participating in the series of services, the musical portion of which began with evensong on June 20, when the anthem sung was Orlando Gibbons's 'Hosanna to the Son of David.' At the choral celebration at 8 o'clock on the following day, the introit, 'One thing have I desired of the Lord,' was written by Dr. Monk, organist of the Cathedral. The Benediction service took place at noon with much musical, ecclesiastical and civic dignity. The two choirs were heard with fine effect in Brahms's anthem 'How lovely is Thy dwelling place, O Lord of Hosts'; and during the presentation of the alms, 'O Lord my God' (S. S. Wesley) was sung, followed by a solemn 'Te Deum.' A special band of ringers, a 'Cornish band' and a 'Mixed band,' with members of the Guild of Ringers of Devon and Cornwall, rang peals during the day, in addition to an opening peal during the service. The programme included Grand sire Cators, Stedman, Rounds, Changes, Bob Royal and Kent Treble Bob, concluding with a short touch and fall of the bells. In the evening the two choirs gave a concert in the Public Rooms, Messrs. Dean Trotter, Walter Belgrove, Norman Kendall, Arthur Kellet and S. J. Bishop (Exeter) singing solos, and the Truro Choir rendering glees and madrigals by Spoforth, Lloyd, Morley, Ouseley, Stanford, Wilbye, Sullivan, Bennet, Bishop, Purcell and Smart.

EXETER DIOCESAN CHORAL UNION.

In the triennial rota opportunity was given this year to the choirs of the Archdeaconry of Totnes to participate in the annual festival of the Exeter Diocesan Choral Union on July 5, and ten deaneries were represented by thirty-three choirs, producing a total of 876 singers, who gathered from Brixham, Paignton, Torwood, Kingsteignton, Moreton-hampstead, Wolborough, Okehampton, Bridesstowe, Cornwood, Ermington, Holbeton, Plymstock, Ugborough, Avonwick, Kingsbridge, Yealampton, Tavistock, Kelly, Kelly College, Horrabridge, Fitzford, Plymouth, Stoke Damarel, Buckfastleigh, Salcombe, East Allington, South Milton, West Allington, Woodleigh, Morchard Bishop, and Exeter. Mr. T. Roylands-Smith conducted, assisted by Messrs. F. Harris (Paignton), W. Clotworthy (Tavistock), W. Beer, (Kingsbridge) and J. H. Burt (Exeter); and Dr. D. J. Wood at the organ gave invaluable aid in the accompaniments. The evening canticles were sung to Lloyd in D; the anthem was Tours's 'Praise God in His Holiness,' and the Te Deum was sung to Stewart in G. A beautiful setting of the hymn 'Praise God, the One Thrice-holy,' by Arthur Henry Brown, was a dignified processional, and a very fine plainsong, the ancient 'Martyr Dei,' was sung to the ancient hymn 'Jesu, Creator of the world.' With appropriateness the recessional 'Thy hand, O God, has guided,' was sung to Dr. S. S. Wesley's tune. Another touch of reminiscence was the playing by Dr. Wood of the Fugue in G minor (Bach), the day being the thirty-third anniversary of the occasion when he played the piece as a test for the post of organist.

Other festivals in affiliation with the Diocesan Union have been conducted by Mr. Roylands-Smith, at Braunton on July 13, with 120 singers, and at Colyton on July 27, with 300 singers.

RIPON CATHEDRAL.

On July 12, Ripon Cathedral was the scene of a most interesting and successful festival service, the musical portions of which were rendered by the combined choirs of York, Durham and Ripon. Advantage was rightly taken of the occasion by including in the scheme Dr. S. S. Wesley's fine eight-part anthem 'O Lord, Thou art my God.' The antiphonal effects which form such a feature of the work were well brought out, while in quality of tone, enunciation and attack, the singers reached a high level of excellence.

The bass solo was admirably sung by Mr. J. W. Senior, who was also associated with other members of the Ripon Choir in a sympathetic rendering of the quintet 'For this mortal must put on immortality.' The choir numbered about a hundred men and boys. The exacting duties of conductor were in the safe hands of Mr. C. H. Moody, organist of Ripon Cathedral, and to his energy and skill the great success of the music was due. The organists were Mr. T. Tertius Noble, organist of York Minster, and the Rev. A. D. Culley, organist of Durham Cathedral, the former being responsible for the earlier portions of the service. The Magnificat and Nunc dimittis were sung to Dr. Mann's setting in E, and the hymns comprised the stately processional 'Hail, festal day,' by Dr. Armes, and Mr. Moody's setting of an offertory hymn written by Mr. William Robertson, of Ripon. An interesting feature was the attendance of a number of American visitors (who are engaged on a tour styled 'The music lover's pilgrimage').

Success seems to be in store for the Manchester Diocesan Church Music Society, according to the report of the first year's progress read at the annual meeting of the general committee on July 5. The Bishop of Manchester was in the chair, as President of the Society, and many members attended. The objects in view are the help and encouragement of church music in the diocese of Manchester, and the promotion of good fellowship and brotherhood amongst those engaged in church music. That these sentiments should spring from a cathedral is surely right and proper, and as the important duties of hon. secretary and conductor are undertaken by the cathedral organist (in this case, Mr. Sydney H. Nicholson), it would be strange indeed if success were not attained. In his report, Mr. Nicholson announced that local centres had been formed in nine important towns, and that fourteen festival services had already been held. The total membership was more than 4,600, and 153 choirs had joined, and taken part in the festivals. He also announced that there would be a combined festival for Manchester choirs, on the completion of the rebuilding of the organ.

SPECIAL SERVICES.

On June 26, at Eccleston Parish Church, a festival of two choirs (Charnock and Eccleston) was held. There was, of course, a full choral service, the Magnificat and Nunc dimittis being sung to the setting in F by Berthold Tours. The anthems selected were 'Great is the Lord' (Sydenham) and 'In humble faith' (Garrett). There were processional and recessional hymns, and the Ely Confession and Tallis's Responses were included. Mr. J. Stubbs (director of the music) presided at the organ.

Sterndale Bennett's cantata the 'Woman of Samaria' was given with organ accompaniment only at St. Mary's Church, West Didsbury, on June 26. Mr. S. Langford conducted, Mrs. Horace Evans was at the organ, and the solo parts were sung by Miss Elisabeth Meacham, Miss Annie Worsley, Miss Elsie Gough, Mr. W. Atkinson and Mr. E. Rushton.

A festival service was held at Llandaff Cathedral on July 14, in which twenty-two choirs, numbering 978 voices, took part. A fine rendering of Sir George Martin's anthem, 'Ho, every one that thirsteth,' was given, while equal justice was done to the setting of the Te Deum composed by Mr. G. G. Beale. There were several hymns, which included that used as a processional, viz., 'Rejoice to-day with one accord,' by J. W. Elliott. Mr. G. G. Beale, organist of the cathedral, was at the organ, and Mr. David Jones, organist of St. Peter's, Pentre, Rhondda, conducted.

The annual choral festival for the rural deanery of East was held at Millbrook on July 14. Choirs to the number of 200 voices attended from the following parishes: Maker, Rame, Millbrook, Antony, Menheniot, Merrymeth, St. Germans, Hessenford, Landrake, and Callington. The music was that selected by the Truro Diocesan Choral Association Committee for the current year. Mr. P. P. Wedlake conducted, and the service was chanted by Canon Hammond.

The visit of the choir of All Souls', Leeds, to Stanhope, Durham, by the kind invitation of the Lord Bishop of Richmond, on July 15 and 16, concluded with a special service in Stanhope Parish Church, the choral portions of which were sustained by the visiting choir. The music chosen comprised Eaton Fanning's setting of the Canticles in C, Attwood's 'Teach me, O Lord,' and Handel's 'Let the bright seraphim.' A short organ recital was afterwards given by Mr. S. Wallbank, who played Bach's Fugue in D, the Prière and Noel by Saint-Saëns, and the Finale from Guilman's Sonata (Op. 48).

On Sunday, July 17, at Hornsey Parish Church, a selection from the works of Dr. S. S. Wesley was given by the choir, under the able direction of Mr. Henry J. Baker, organist and choirmaster of the church. With the exception of the 'Agnus Dei' and 'Gloria in excelsis,' which was sung to Merbecke, the whole of the music was by Dr. Wesley. The canticles were sung to the setting in F, and the anthems were 'Blessed be the God and Father' and 'The Wilderness.' The voluntaries included the Andantes in G and E flat, the Prelude and Fugue in C minor, and the Larghetto in F sharp minor. A similar service is promised for August 14, Dr. Wesley's birthday.

THE ORGAN IN RUGBY SCHOOL CHAPEL.

The organ at Rugby has recently undergone extensive alterations and improvement by Messrs. Norman & Beard, under the direction of Mr. Basil Johnson, organist and music-master of the School, and may be regarded as an important addition to the number of fine instruments in the country generally and public schools in particular.

The new solo organ has been added in memory of Mr. Edwin Edwards, who was for twenty-two years organist to the School, and the scheme of the instrument, which he formulated and which was partially carried out by Messrs. Bryceson, has now been modernized and completed by Messrs. Norman & Beard. Very nearly all the old pipes have been included, but there are twenty-two new stops, and the mechanism, tubular pneumatic, is entirely new.

The following is the complete specification:

Number of accessory movements 40

Total number of pipes 3,131

The wind is supplied by a 'Kinetic' blower driven by a 10 h.p. motor, the apparatus being placed in a cellar at the corner of the new quadrangle.

An interesting series of organ recitals has been given in St. James's Church, Whitehaven, by Mr. G. Tootell, organist of the church, where the instrument is widely known as a splendid example of Messrs. Harrison & Harrison's work. The programmes chosen have shown off the organ to great advantage by reason of their scope and variety. Every style has been represented, from Bach and Handel to Wagner, and several living composers, including Max Reger. Interesting and well-written analytical notes by Mr. Tootell added greatly to the enjoyment of the congregation, and, with the recitals, must have been of value in the musical education of the district.

At Manchester University, on July 1, M. Alexandre Guilman gave an organ recital on the Whitworth Hall instrument to an audience which packed the building to excess, very many being turned away. The next day the University did honour to itself and to the veteran organist by conferring the degree of Mus. Doc., honoris causa, upon M. Guilman, Dr. Pyne introducing him to the assembly.

A new organ was dedicated in St. Michael's Church, Devonport, on July 7, Mr. F. W. Moreton giving a recital. Mr. W. N. Curnow accompanied the service. The organ is a three-manual, with a particularly well-furnished swell, and is blown by hydraulic power and fitted with Hele's patent key-stops on the Choir. A new organ, dedicated on July 13 in Brixham Parish Church, has been built at a cost of £1,000. It was opened by Mr. John Hele, of Plymouth.

ORGANIST AND CHOIRMASTER APPOINTMENTS.

Mr. W. H. Carter, organist and choirmaster of the Ven. Bede's, Sunderland.

Mr. Algonwyn W. J. Osborne, organist and choirmaster of Theydon Bois Parish Church, Essex.

Mr. George H. Rees, organist and choirmaster of Crown Court Scottish National Church, Covent Garden.

Reviews.

- Te Deum laudamus*. Set to music in the key of A. By W. G. Ross.
Magnificat and Nunc dimittis in E flat. By G. A. Macfarren.
The Office for the Holy Communion in C and E flat. By Healey Willan.

[Novello & Co., Ltd.]

Mr. Ross's setting of the Te Deum is in many ways well written, and much of it should prove effective when sung, though it demands a choir of more than average attainments, by reason of the independence of the organ part and of the many unaccompanied portions allotted to the voices. We doubt the wisdom of the sudden modulation from A major to G major at the words 'The glorious company,' which is attained by practically one chord. We are also perplexed at a progression in the organ part leading to 'O Lord, let Thy mercy,' but there may possibly be a misprint which would explain it. Though some passages are to us reminiscent, we may be forgiven if we say that good models have been chosen. Mr. Ross's setting should encourage him to further effort, provided he aim more at directness of expression and modulation, with originality.

The issue in octavo form of Macfarren's setting in E flat should be welcomed by choirs seeking music of a robust and healthy character, of which we have scarcely enough. The service deserves wide recognition, which its diatonic and straightforward character and original treatment should secure for it.

Mr. Healey Willan takes a high ideal of what a setting of the Holy Communion Office should be, and while his music is undoubtedly the work of a gifted and cultured musician, we plead with him to deny himself by writing more simply. We are certain he can do so without sacrificing his ideals. It is possible that with the great advances made in choral singing, the music before us may be often performed, but a simpler style would no doubt find a wider acceptance. Mr. Willan evidently has faith in the capabilities of the modern organist, for the organ part would tax the resources of many players, and of their instruments also. There are many fine points in the service, such, for instance, as that at the words, 'And the third day.' The 'Sanctus,' too, should be effective, and so should the 'Gloria in Excelsis.'

The life and works of Edward John Hopkins, Mus.D. Cantuar., F.R.C.O., Organist of the Temple Church 1843-1898. By Charles William Pearce, Mus.D. Cantab., F.R.C.O.

[The Vincent Music Co., Ltd.]

'The inception and growth of the modern English schools of organ-building and organ-playing owe exceedingly much to the pioneer labours and influence of the late organist of the Temple Church.' So says Dr. Pearce in the Preface to his very interesting book, and we heartily agree with him. Fifty-five years organist of the Temple Church! What changes, what advancement, must have passed before the eyes of the veteran musician! That he bore a prominent part in the progress of the tonal scheme of the organ is abundantly shown in the admirably-written book before us. Dr. Hopkins was not content without a thorough examination of the best examples offered by Continental organ-builders, and his visits abroad are vividly described. That he went with an open mind is evident by his capitulation on the subject of the 'vox humana.' Speaking of French organs generally, he observes, 'I must confess myself a perfect convert in respect to the "Voix Humaine" stop when I tried the one at Amiens. I was very much delighted with the quality, and my previous opinion of this stop began to waver; but its effect as a Swell stop—under expressive control—especially with the tremulant, is one of the most perfect things I have ever heard.' That he was content with small scale and light wind is evident from another quotation. When at the Madeleine in Paris, he says: 'Nor did I ever feel so convinced (by contrast) of the coarse, boisterous and irreligious effect of the large English pedal pipes. Nothing can be more tranquil and soothing than some of the 8-ft. and 4-ft. flute-work in this organ.' But we recommend Dr. Pearce's book to all who are interested (and they must be many) in the varied experiences of a long and remarkable life. They will find here graphic descriptions of Hopkins' early struggles, with his long, wet walks to Mitcham Church (ending with his boots full of water), his mutual practices and blowings with his cousin, J. L. Hopkins, his meetings with Mendelssohn, and indeed innumerable incidents which only such a life affords. We very heartily congratulate Dr. Pearce on his delightful book, which is most appropriately inscribed to his friend Dr. H. Walford Davies.

My Susan was a bonny lass. Sigh no more, ladies. By Frederic Austin.

[Novello & Co., Ltd.]

'The river was in full flood and, had it remained so another twenty-four hours, would undoubtedly have overwhelmed the enemy; but it sank far below its normal level more rapidly than it had risen three days before.' This footnote to Sir Edward Elgar's 'The River' explains the purpose of the poem, a kind of invocation to the river Rustula, which

Sank and fainted, low and lower
 When thy mission was to save,
 Coward, traitress, shameless!
 Rustula!

The heroic strain of the words, which are a paraphrase of an Eastern European folk-song, is borne out in the music. The setting of the first stanza is reproduced in the settings of the second and fourth, with variations in the accompaniment and an increased dramatic intensity at the end. The striking feature of the song is the demand it makes and the opportunity it gives for varied and vivid expression in its interpretation, and in the hands of a singer who has these qualities and a broad style of vocalisation at his command, it should become one of the most effective of the composer's shorter vocal works. The pianoforte part presents little difficulty; publication in three keys brings the song within the range of all voices.

The rhythmic vigour and directness of expression of Mr. Coleridge-Taylor's 'Sons of the sea' will commend it to singers, of whom baritones with a turn for dramatic emphasis will find it best suited to their range and style. In Mr. Lambert's 'Silent love,' which is also written for middle voices, smooth phrasing is essential; the note of the song is simplicity.

Mr. Newton secures widely differing effects with his two songs mentioned above. The sentiment of 'Love is for ever' is not overdone, and its demands for expressive singing are made easier to satisfy by the absence of complexity and difficulty. The melody is attractive, and attaches itself to the memory. In 'Zummerzethire' a native of the western county tells in six humorous verses, cleverly set to music appropriately idiomatic and with a captivating lilt, his impressions of a visit to 'Lunnon Town' and winds up with the aphorism 'there bean't no boobies in Zummerzethire.'

Mr. Frederic Austin can compose in an unmistakably English idiom strongly reminiscent of the old style, and at the same time contrive to say something fresh and original. 'My Susan was a bonny lass' is an example. It is vigorously conceived, and owes something to its arresting changes of measure. It owes more, however, to the musicianship which is displayed in the detail of almost every bar. 'Sigh no more, ladies' is just as effective, and throws new light on the musical possibilities of these often-set words. The first-mentioned song is published in three keys and the second in two keys.

Vier Gesänge. Poems by Martin Drescher. English versions by Mrs. Bertram Shapleigh. Composed by Hugo Kaun (Op. 86).

[Ed. Bote & G. Bock, Berlin.]

The endeavour to be artistic and the endeavour to be original can be traced side by side in these songs; occasionally their effect is cumulative, and here and there they clash. In 'Staff and bundle in my hand' ('In der einen Hand den Stab') the words express the feelings of an outcast, whose restlessness and bitterness are well conveyed in the accompaniment. 'Ask me no more' portrays vividly and dramatically the wrath of one who sought for repose in solitude, and sought for love, but failed in both quests. The pianoforte part, which is vigorously conceived and symphonic in design, supports a bold, declamatory vocal part. 'The Vagabond' ('Der Vagabund') is playful in character and interesting throughout, if not highly inspired. 'We sat by the wayside' ('Wir sassen am Wege') is discursive and unequal in effect, but on the whole highly expressive. The four songs represent a conscientious attempt to do justice to the poems, in which a restrained but individual use is made of the resources of modern harmony.

Grand Cortège. 'Original Compositions for the Organ,' No. 30. By Edwin H. Lemare.

Overture in C sharp minor. 'The Recital Series,' No. 37. By Bernard Johnson.

Allegretto. 'The Recital Series,' No. 38. By Claude E. Cover.

[Novello & Co., Ltd.]

Strong, rhythmic figures and bold harmonic progressions are the outstanding features of Mr. Lemare's effective organ piece, which will be welcome to those organists possessing instruments of adequate resources for the effects indicated. Excellent contrast in theme and registration is afforded by the middle section, which is followed by an effective passage leading to the recapitulation.

Mr. Bernard Johnson's overture is labelled 'Homage à Tchaikovsky,' which is fully accounted for by the appearance and development of a similar theme to that which gives the despondent character to the last movement of the Russian master's 'Symphonie Pathétique.' There is much that, if difficult, is interesting, and the overture should find a place in the programmes of organists wishing for strenuous and well-written music. The harmonies are well distributed, and the carefully indicated registration should secure a truthful interpretation of the work.

The Allegretto by Mr. Cover is of slighter build than the foregoing, but none the less acceptable as a deftly-written and effective piece, suitable as exhibiting the organ in its gentler mood.

Correspondence.

DR. ARNE'S RELIGION.

TO THE EDITOR OF 'THE MUSICAL TIMES.'

DEAR SIR,—I am glad that my previous letter regarding Dr. Arne's sacred compositions for the Catholic church elicited such a valuable article as that which appeared in your June issue from the pen of Mr. W. Barclay Squire. My contention was that Arne—like his mother, Anne Wheeler, who was, according to Dr. Burney, 'a bigoted Roman Catholic'—lived and died a Catholic, and acted as organist of the Sardinian Chapel in Lincoln's Inn Fields, also composing Masses and motets for that old private place of worship. Mr. Squire's article corroborates all this, but it also reveals an important episode, namely, that Arne, under the stress of the cruel penal laws against Catholics, conformed for a time to the Protestant church. As the article leaves the reader to infer that Arne's 'conformity' shortly before making his will means that he died in the Anglican communion, I wish to remove that impression. Arne was a Catholic all his life, and though weak in many matters, even so far as to yield to the temptation of conforming in order to secure a legal status for his worldly goods, he again 'verted' before his death to the ancient faith, and thus died a Catholic, like his sister, Mrs. Cibber.

I am happy to be able to supply the following account of Arne's last days: Having become reconciled to Mrs. Arne, from whom he had separated for several years, he determined to secure her a competency in case of his death.

Unfortunately the existing laws utterly debarred Catholics from making due testamentary provisions, and therefore Arne conformed. However, in his last illness he sent for Father Peter Browne, senior chaplain of the Sardinian Embassy at Lincoln's Inn Fields, and was received back into the Catholic church. I may also observe that in the same year (1778) Father Browne received the Rev. George Chamberlayne, Fellow and Bursar of King's College, Cambridge, into the Church.

Dr. W. H. Cummings, in his article on Arne in the current issue (July-September) of the 'Quarterly Magazine of the International Musical Society,' amply sustains my views, and he quotes from 'a trustworthy contemporary writer' as follows: 'In his last stage, the dormant seeds of early maxims revived in his bosom too strong to be checked. A priest was sent for, and he was soon awed into a state of submissive repentance. For about an hour before his death he sang an harmonious Halleluja, calculated to usher him into the other world.' Joe Vernon heard Arne sing this 'harmonious Halleluja,' singing which he expired on March 5, 1778. It was only in the year that Arne died that the British Parliament passed the first Act of Toleration towards Catholics, rendering them capable of acquiring real property, whether by inheritance or purchase. Yet the penalty for not 'conforming' still remained on the Statute Book, and in 1782 an instance of the law being enforced occurred in Yorkshire.—Yours faithfully,

W. H. GRATTAN-FLOOD.

A MUSICIAN'S HOLIDAY.

TO THE EDITOR OF 'THE MUSICAL TIMES.'

SIR,—Will you permit me to call the attention of your readers to 'The Musicians' Holiday' to be held on the North Coast of Ireland under the auspices of the Home Music Study Union from September 3 to 13 next? Combining as it does the attraction of fine scenery, the open air, informal lectures on music and recitals and the freest of good fellowship, it should, I think, make a strong appeal to both amateur and professional musicians, both ladies and gentlemen. The effort is entirely a voluntary one, and the lecturers—Dr. E. C. Bairstow, Mr. Rutland Boughton, Mr. Thomas J. Hoggett and Mr. Percy A. Scholes—all give their services. Any music-lover is welcomed, whether a member of the Home Music Study Union or not. I shall be delighted to send a copy of the circular to any of your readers who desire it. I may add that the willing co-operation of numerous helpers has enabled us to make the cost of the holiday a very small one, and that there are cheap fares from most parts of the country.

Yours faithfully,

49, West Cliff Terrace, J. E. LAWRENCE.
Harrogate. (Hon. General Secretary.)

TALLIS'S CANON.

TO THE EDITOR OF 'THE MUSICAL TIMES.'

SIR,—A peculiarity in Tallis's well-known Canon, usually sung to Bishop Ken's evening hymn 'Glory to Thee, my God, this night,' has just been pointed out to me. I wonder if it is generally known. It is this: each of the four strains of which it is made up consists of the same chords and progressions as the other three strains, so that two, three, or all the four could be sung or played simultaneously, if the second chord of the tune were slightly altered as follows:

It would be interesting to know if a copy exists in this form, and also if there are other tunes with this remarkable peculiarity. Would it be considered allowable to print future copies with this slight alteration?

Obituary.

We regret to record the following deaths:

ALFRED EDWARD IZARD, at Kingsgate, near Broadstairs, Kent, on July 11. The news of the death of this able musician at the early age of forty-seven came as a shock to the deceased's numerous professional and other friends. A nervous breakdown had afflicted him last summer, and he retired to Kingsgate to recruit. After a time he regained strength, but in the spring he suffered a relapse which ended in a peaceful death. Mr. Izard became a student of the Royal Academy of Music in 1878, making the pianoforte his principal study. He became a sub-professor in 1883, and a full professor in 1885, and that post he held until his decease. He was a very skilful accompanist, and his services in this direction were therefore greatly valued by professional singers. He had many social qualities that endeared him to a large circle of friends who are now saddened by his death, and whose sincere sympathy will be extended to his bereaved wife and children. Mr. Izard was a nephew of Mr. Frederick Walker, who deeply laments his loss.

ARTHUR HEW DALRYMPLE PRENDERGAST, on July 13, at 57, Cromwell Road, Kensington, aged seventy-seven. Mr. Prendergast was a well-known figure at musical gatherings, more especially those concerned with English music in particular. He was one of the first, if not actually the first, to introduce Elgar's choral music into London, he having conducted Miss Holland's choir at a performance of 'The Black Knight,' given in May, 1895. He had considerable gifts as a composer. He won the Madrigal Society's prizes in 1880 and in 1889. He was educated for the law, but he abandoned this career in order to devote himself to music. He was born on June 28, 1833.

HERR HANS SIMROCK, at Berlin, on June 26. The deceased, who was born in 1861, had been for nine years the head of the music-publishing firm of Simrock.

LOUIS-ALBERT BOURGAULT-DUCOUDRAY, on June 4, at Vernouillet (Seine-et-Oise). Born at Nantes on February 2, 1840, he became a pupil of the Paris Conservatoire, where he studied composition under Ambroise Thomas. In 1862 he obtained the Prix de Rome. He is best known through his studies on the folk-music of Greece and Brittany. He was appointed professor of musical history at the Paris Conservatoire in 1878, and held the post for thirty years.

HOFRAAT DR. ALOYS OBRIST, on June 29, at Stuttgart. From 1895-1900 he was first conductor at the Stuttgart Court Opera. He afterwards devoted himself to music-scientific studies, and acted as 'Custos' to the Liszt Museum in Weimar. He was also a very active member of the executive committee of the Allgemeine Deutsche Musikverein.

A series of twelve festival concerts will be given by the orchestra of the Konzertverein Munich, in the new Music Festival Hall of the Munich Exhibition, from August 5 to September 4, with Ferdinand Löwe as director. The programme will include the whole of Beethoven's Symphonies and twelve other Symphonies by Mendelssohn, Brahms, Bruckner and Liszt. Prospectuses and further information may be had from the office of the Music Festivals, also from the Travellers' Bureau, Schencker & Co., Munich.—The first French musical festival in Munich will be held in the Exhibition from September 18 to 20, under the patronage of the Société française des Amis de la Musique. The object of this festival is to show for the first time in foreign territory the development of French classical and modern composition. The festival will consist of three orchestral concerts and two matinées of chamber-music. The management of the Munich Court Opera has arranged for two performances. The most prominent French composers, directors, instrumental and vocal soloists will participate, also the Munich Madrigal-Vereinigung and the Munich Tonkünstler-Orchester.

FOUR WEEKS OF MUSICAL LIFE IN LONDON : THE IMPRESSIONS OF A GERMAN MUSICIAN.

By PROFESSOR THEODOR MÜLLER-REUTER, of CREFELD.

It was with the object of making historical researches in the musical archives of the British Museum, and of learning something of the actualities of London's musical and concert life during its season, that I visited the metropolis in May of this year. In a stay of four weeks it is manifestly impossible, even with the best will in the world and the exercise of the greatest energy, to arrive at a conclusion on London's musical activities that can in any way be regarded as final and all-embracing. Nevertheless, performances in concert hall and theatre, and constant intercourse with distinguished English artists, professors, composers and others of the musical world have contributed to produce a number of impressions which may not be without a certain value. It is therefore with the greatest pleasure that, in compliance with the courteous request of the editor of this journal, I now set my impressions on paper, at the same time asking that what I have written may not be considered in any sense a treatise on English, or even London, musical life.

LONDON AS A MUSICAL CENTRE.

For a long period London, that marvel of cities, has been during the season the all-compelling magnet to the leading musical artists of all countries. Here composers, conductors, virtuosi, and singers have sought and found that hearty recognition which leads to both artistic and financial success. Germany, the land of music par excellence, has always contributed a specially large contingent of musical visitors, while the free import of German music into England has ever flourished, carrying with it many and unquestionable benefits. In fact, a careful observer cannot fail to notice that for many years there has existed between England and Germany a musical reciprocity which has been made possible largely through increased musical activity in England. A generation of native, highly capable musicians has sprung up, and conspicuous in the forefront stand artists who compete with the best that Germany and the Continent can produce. Contemporary British composers are making their foothold in Germany ever surer, and in the realm of choral music Englishmen have achieved lasting success. In this connection special mention must be made of Sir Edward Elgar, whose orchestral works also have a prominent place in German programmes; indeed, his Symphony in A flat (Op. 55)—a very important work, the first German performance of which was conducted by Arthur Nikisch in Berlin—will certainly be performed several times in Germany next winter. I must not omit mention of those other eminent musicians, Sir Hubert Parry, Sir Alexander Mackenzie and Sir Charles Stanford.

English virtuosi and singers are not very well known to German audiences, but judging by the excellent performances I have heard, the visits of English artists to Germany will certainly be more numerous in the near future. The competitions of German male-voice choirs have their English parallel in the important mixed-choir competitions, the influence of which on English music is of much greater value than that of German male-voice competitions on music of the Fatherland. That the quantity of music given in a city of seven millions—the Mecca of artists of every civilised nation—is greater than in Berlin, is natural, but to me the quality also appeared higher.

THE QUEEN'S HALL AND LONDON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRAS.

As a conductor, I found most to interest me in the orchestras of London, of which I heard three in the following order—Queen's Hall, Philharmonic and London Symphony. In addition to these, I made the acquaintance of the opera orchestras of Covent Garden and His Majesty's Theatre (the Beecham Orchestra), and the orchestras of the Empire and Palace Theatres of Varieties. Let us consider the concert orchestras first. One's first impression is of the wonderful orchestral tone, which without any doubt exceeds that of our German orchestras in its round, full quality. This beauty of tone has something bewitching in it, the purity of intonation is excellent, and the orchestral discipline truly remarkable. The blending of string and wind tone alike in pp and ff is so perfect that one could almost say that the wind tone is embraced by the strings. This perfect blending is not due to the disposition of the orchestra, which is in the form of a fan and not wedge-shaped as is usual in Germany; for at Covent Garden and His Majesty's Theatres, where the orchestras are of course differently disposed, the same peculiarity is noticeable. The most important factor in the production of so beautiful a tone seems to be the string quartet, in which the bowing suggests the influence of the French school. The welcome, too, which London orchestras give their conductor when he comes on to the platform is a pleasing feature: there is respect on both sides, an earnest of harmonious working. The London Symphony (103 members) seems to stand at the head of the three orchestras. I had the opportunity of studying their quick readiness in accompaniment both at concerts and rehearsals. (To avoid misunderstanding, I may add that I heard the Queen's Hall and Philharmonic orchestras each at one concert only, and the London Symphony at several.) Two works for pianoforte and orchestra by Hinton and Delafosse (performed at different concerts) were easily mastered each at one rehearsal in spite of their many rhythmical difficulties; and experience has shown that the capability of an orchestra and the extent of its musical knowledge are best evidenced by its elasticity and power of adaptation in accompaniment. An equally high standard was attained in Tchaikovsky's Pianoforte concerto in B flat minor, played by Katherine Goodson and Lambrino. Of pure orchestral performances, I would mention first Wagner's 'Siegfried Idyll' as a pattern of tonal beauty, and with it the last movement of Brahms's fourth Symphony, the Passacaglia, which under Nikisch's master-hand seemed to lose its austere colour, and was played with the utmost verve. Among other works given by the London Symphony Orchestra were Tchaikovsky's fourth and Beethoven's seventh symphonies, Brahms's 'Haydn variations', the 'Coriolan' and 'Euryanthe' overtures, a new symphony by the young Russian composer M. Steinberg, and several compositions by Wagner. With the exception of the symphonies by Beethoven and Steinberg, which were conducted by Albert Coates—known in Germany through his work as conductor at Elberfeld and Mannheim—everything was in the hands of Arthur Nikisch, with whose absolute mastery of the orchestra it was difficult for the younger artist to compete. The favour shown to Russian music cannot fail to strike the German musician. In five concerts Tchaikovsky's Symphonies Nos. 4 and 6, the Pianoforte concerto (twice), and symphonies by Rachmaninoff and Steinberg were performed. The 'Pathetic' symphony was played by Henry J. Wood with the Queen's Hall Orchestra at the impressive memorial service to the late King Edward. Three thousand people in deepest mourning, the ladies' head-dresses presenting a swaying sea of black feathers and ribbons—the absence of applause—the visible emotion of the soloist, Madame Ada Crossley—Chopin's Funeral March received standing at the commencement of the programme, and at the close 'God Save the King'—between them Mendelssohn's aria from 'Elijah', 'O rest in the Lord' and Sullivan's aria 'And God shall wipe away all tears', Mozart's Masonic Funeral Music, and Tchaikovsky's 'Pathetic' symphony—made a moving and fitting tribute to the memory of the dead ruler, 'the visibly beloved' of his sorrowing people. The 'Pathetic' symphony hardly seemed appropriate to the reverent feeling and sadness pervading the audience, at least as regards the two middle movements, which are certainly not in keeping with the expression of mourning. The Queen's Hall Orchestra, especially the wind, revelled in it. Every conductor knows that uncomfortable place in the first movement, where the melody in D major played by the clarinet is taken up in the lower register by the bassoon. It would be impossible to imagine a nearer approach to a perfect blend of tone between the two instruments than was obtained on this occasion. The tempo adopted for the second movement, and the stretto at the end of the third are open to question, and the climax of the first movement did not attain the tremendous effect possible. But these details in no way detract from the very high opinion I formed of the orchestra's work, which, in the fullest sense of the word, was excellent.

THE PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.

The Philharmonic Society is in an enviable position. It is in its ninety-eighth season, has a guarantee fund of £2,566, and over four hundred subscribers who contribute about £1,300. With such resources, something may be done by the Society even in expensive London! The most important work in the seventh concert of the season was Rachmaninoff's voluminous Symphony in E minor; Liszt's first Rhapsody, served up by Arthur Nikisch 'with a little red pepper,' ended the programme. The orchestra of the Philharmonic Society is closely connected with the London Symphony Orchestra, as may be gathered from the lists of their respective members. Fifty-six artists of the London Symphony Orchestra—among them the best of the wind—belong also to the Philharmonic. It is not easy to perceive any difference in the standard of their performances; and if I am inclined to give the London Symphony first place, it must not be forgotten that, as I have already remarked, I heard them four times and the Philharmonic only once. From this it is evident that the London Symphony Orchestra plays more often together, and thus more readily achieves perfect unanimity and balance. The accompanying powers of the Philharmonic Orchestra showed themselves in Ernest Schelling's 'Fantastic Suite' for pianoforte and orchestra to be on the same high level as those of the London Symphony Orchestra; the work seemed to me, after one hearing, a noteworthy addition to music literature, and I must say the same of the works by Hinton and Delafosse in similar form. In Rachmaninoff's Symphony the wind players again excelled; I am sorry that I have no space in this article to mention them separately. In Liszt's Rhapsody, Nikisch played just as he pleased with the orchestra.

COVENT GARDEN OPERA.

Another concert Orchestra, the New Symphony, I unfortunately had no opportunity of hearing, but I attended performances at Covent Garden and His Majesty's Theatre. I was extremely sorry that the master, Hans Richter, was not conducting at Covent Garden. Herr von Schuch was taking his place, and directed 'Tristan and Isolde.' With regard to the ensemble, the performance at Covent Garden was not to be compared with the performances at Dresden, where I have heard the work several times under von Schuch. There his virtuosity as a conductor meets with a very different response from the orchestra. However, this is no detriment to the Covent Garden Orchestra, seeing that the Court Orchestra in Dresden has many years' experience of and intimate acquaintance with their conductor's slightest movements and changes of facial expression. The same sonority of the strings was apparent both here and at His Majesty's; it is obviously a speciality of London orchestras, and German conductors, as well as orchestral players, can learn much from it.

THE BEECHAM OPERA.

A new undertaking, the Thomas Beecham Opera Comique season, at His Majesty's Theatre, Haymarket, opened its doors for the first time in May. In England, theatres are heavily handicapped, for there is no State subsidy, whilst the municipal theatre is unknown; but if soloists, chorus and orchestra remain on the same high level as in this, Mr. Beecham's first season, it is possible that the undertaking may survive. Thomas Beecham conducted Offenbach's 'Tales of Hoffmann' with considerable energy. He certainly believes in Hans von Bülow's bon mot 'In the beginning was rhythm.' I was very glad to make the acquaintance of Stanford's romantic comic opera 'Shamus O'Brien,' the performance of which, however, was not so good as that of the 'Tales of Hoffmann.' The opera has been given in Breslau, but on account of its political subject is hardly likely to find a permanent place in German répertoires.

CONCERTS.

To return to the concert-hall. Pugno and Ysaÿe played in Queen's Hall, at three o'clock in the afternoon, three Beethoven Pianoforte and Violin sonatas. There was an attentive audience of nearly 2,000 people, many of whom had brought the music with them. To assume from the size of the audience that chamber music is more admired than in Germany would naturally be wrong; but it would appear that in England there are not so many opportunities of hearing chamber music, and consequently the appetite is not sated. A glance at the German music calendar will show that in Berlin there are thirty-two societies which give chamber music concerts. Ysaÿe and Pugno naturally play Beethoven sonatas differently from Joachim and d'Albert, but the readings of the two artists of the French school were full of charm. Among the pianists I heard, first mention must be made of Rosenthal and Katherine Goodson; indeed, the latter must to-day be counted among the foremost in her branch of the profession. A serious appreciation of Pachmann's art is, in spite of his beautiful touch, rendered difficult by his gesticulations. Schelling and Delafosse were very interesting as composers; I have already spoken of their suites. Mary Dvorak played for no apparent reason Liszt's transcription of the 'Tannhäuser' overture. If it must be played, it is surely better in the hands of a man. A young generation of native lady pianists has studied under and been brought out by Mr. Tobias Matthay, whose pupils, Myra Hess, Hilda Saxe, and Gertrude Peppercorn gave ample evidence of the great ability of their teacher.

COSMOPOLITAN LONDON.

Concert life in London is essentially international; every civilized nation sends its artists. To make the acquaintance of English, French, Belgian, American, Russian, German, Bohemian, and Hungarian singers, virtuosi, composers and conductors, in the limited time at my command, was to me a matter for congratulation, not only from the pleasure that the opportunity afforded, but also from the instruction derived from the experience. When to this I add, and with the fullest conviction, that there was nothing inferior, I give to my readers a true, if somewhat inadequate picture, of my hastily-gathered impressions. The international character of London's concert life is best made clear to those not intimately connected with it either by business or profession, by a number of names taken at random: Nikisch, Wood, Coates, von Schuch, Beecham, Rosenthal, Lambrino, Katherine Goodson, Hinton, Schelling, Delafosse, Elena Gerhardt, Ida Riman, Ada Crossley, Pauline Donalda, Susan Strong, Olga de la Bruyère, Gerardy, Zimbalist, Burrian, van Rooy, Steinberg, Rachmaninoff, &c. Of composers, I have only mentioned those now living. It is indeed a many-sided picture, and there may be a certain danger for native art in these widely varying influences; at least, much that I heard seemed to suggest this, but the experiences and impressions of four weeks are by no means sufficient to afford convincing proof. To sum up, I left London with the knowledge that English orchestral performances are on a very high level, that English composers are well able to hold their own, and that the rising generation of English virtuosi and singers is more than very capable. Taken all together, it must with pleasure be admitted that a German musician can to-day learn a great deal in London, the centre of English life and thought.

After a most enjoyable visit, I left the city of cities, full of gratitude for the hospitality shown me by all the artists with whom I had been fortunate enough to come in contact.

ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

FOUNDATION STONE LAID.

On July 14, Lord Strathcona and Mount Royal laid the foundation stone of the new building of the Royal Academy of Music in Marylebone Road. The occasion was a landmark in the history of the Academy, and in this connection some brief historical particulars may be of interest. The inception and carrying out of the scheme for a National School of Music were largely due to the zeal of John Fane (Lord Burghersh), eleventh Earl of Westmorland. The Royal Academy of Music was founded in 1822 and opened on March 24, 1823, under the patronage of King George IV., who became a benefactor to the Institution by an annual donation of 100 guineas. Both this patronage and contribution were continued by King William IV., by whose command a Handel Festival was held in Westminster Abbey with the help of the students. The proceeds, which exceeded £8,000, were equally divided between the Academy and three other musical organizations. Queen Victoria and King Edward VII. were no less generous in their relations to the Academy, and the tale of Royal patronage is carried continuously from the foundation to the present day by the message from His Majesty King George that was read at the ceremony. Since the death of H.R.H. The Duke of Saxe-Coburg and Gotha, in 1900, the office of President has been held by H.R.H. The Duke of Connaught and Strathearn, whom the recent national bereavement prevented from laying the new foundation stone.

The musical work of the Academy was from the outset governed by methods which hold down to the present day; that is, the educational results were solidified and brought before the public eye by frequent concerts and operatic performances. An orchestra composed of students always assisted at these gatherings. The Associated Board was formed in 1889, under the Presidency of H.R.H. The Prince of Wales, by the union of the Royal Academy of Music and the Royal College of Music as an examining body. The constant increase in the number of students necessitated more than one extension of the premises of the Academy, the most recent addition being that of No. 6, Tenterden Street, in 1892. Over 6,000 students have received musical training at the Academy, and over 500 are now in attendance. The popular and gifted Principal, Sir Alexander Campbell Mackenzie, has held office since 1888. His predecessors since the foundation were Dr. William Crotch, 1823; Mr. Cipriani Potter, 1832; Mr. Charles Lucas, 1859; Sir William Sterndale Bennett, 1866; and Sir George A. Macfarren, 1875.

The expiration of the lease afforded an opportunity for the change of premises that has long been felt to be necessary. The site in Marylebone Road, hitherto occupied by the Marylebone Charity School for Girls, was chosen on account of its many advantages, among which accessibility may be mentioned. The new building, designed by Messrs. Ernest George & Yeates, will consist of a central block with two wings. The east wing will contain the concert hall, 122 feet long by 45 feet wide, which will be provided with a fine organ by Messrs. Norman & Beard, the gift of Mrs. Threlfall, in memory of her husband, the late Mr. Thomas Threlfall, for many years chairman of the committee of management. The difficult problem of deadening sound will be studied in the construction of floors and partitions, and double doors will be arranged to all the rooms. The contractors, Messrs. G. E. Wallis & Sons, of Maidstone, have engaged to finish their work by June 30, 1911.

The function, which had as its central point the laying of the foundation-stone by Lord Strathcona, was a brilliant success, in the credit of which the weather claimed a share. The large number of guests included, besides those mentioned below as contributing speeches, Sir Hubert Parry, Sir Charles Stanford, Sir Ernest Clarke, Dr. Cowen, Mr. Edward German, Dr. Charles Harriss, Sir A. Paolo Tosti, Mr. Oscar Beringer, Mr. Tobias Matthay, Mr. Frederick Corder, other professors at the Academy, and many other people eminent in the musical world. The dedication service was conducted by the Bishop of Kensington and Dr. Morrison, Rector of St. Marylebone. Alderman E. E. Cooper, chairman of the managing committee, read the following letter:

‘Royal Pavilion, Aldershot, July 12.

‘DEAR SIR ALEXANDER MACKENZIE,—I have communicated to The King the contents of your letter of yesterday. His Majesty is very glad to consent to become Patron of the Royal Academy of Music, and trusts that the new building of the Academy—the foundation-stone of which is to be laid on Thursday next—will soon be completed and that the useful work of the Academy will increase and prosper in its new home.

‘Yours very truly,

‘ARTHUR BIGGE.’

and the following telegram from the Duke of Connaught:

‘Congratulate you on stone of our new building being laid. So sorry it was impossible for me to perform the ceremony.’

Lord Strathcona having laid the stone, gave an address, in which he pointed out the excellent work carried on by the Academy since its foundation. He said: Generations of men eminent in the musical world had benefited by the educational facilities which it afforded. The increasing number of pupils desirous of profiting by the benefits offered rendered the accommodation cramped, and the provision of a new building absolutely necessary. The new building would have ample accommodation, and would be fitted in every way to meet the requirements of those using it. Under its improved conditions the Academy might even make an advance on the work of the past, excellent as that work had been.

Lord Kilmorey, in moving a vote of thanks to Lord Strathcona, mentioned that Mrs. Threlfall had promised to give an organ for the concert-room in memory of her late husband.

Sir George Donaldson seconded the motion, which was adopted.

Mr. Alderman Cooper said he had received an interesting communication from Lady Rose Weigall, the last surviving child of the founder of the Royal Academy of Music. She wished to express the pleasure it had been to her to read of the many developments of the institution which was so very near to her father's heart, and for which he worked so indefatigably. Very few of those who worked with him could be alive now, but it was pleasing to feel that his name was revered and honoured. Lady Rose Weigall telegraphed regretting her inability to be present, but stated that her son would represent her.

He then moved a vote of thanks to the Bishop of Kensington and Dr. Morrison, which was seconded by Mr. E. Nicholls and carried.

The Bishop of Kensington, in reply, said he was glad that the site was to be utilised, not for another gigantic block of red-brick flats, but for the home of the mistress of all the Arts, of the queen of all the sciences and of that music without which the world would be a dreary desert indeed.

Sir Alexander Mackenzie delivered the following address:

‘We have been honoured by the gracious encouragement of our Patron The King; by the warm congratulations of our president, the Duke of Connaught; the good will of many generous friends of music is with us; and the founder of the Academy may be said to have spoken to us, through his child.

‘It is now the musician's privilege to finally express the fervent hope that the spirit of our beloved and divine Art may enter with us, and continue to dwell in the house that is to rest on this stone.

‘This exhilarating—and, I confess to me—uplifting moment has long been looked forward to, long honestly and patiently prepared for. And now that it has come, now that the ideal has at last hardened into an accomplished fact, we must remember that although the Academy has done its appointed duty—and done it well, I venture to think—for eighty-eight years, its work may be truly said to be only beginning, because it is entering upon a lease of new life, upon a fresh career with even higher hopes, aspirations, and desires to be useful. And these expectations will call for the unabated, nay, the increased energy, determination and enthusiasm of all who earnestly wish to see them fully realised. And I have no fear that any of these necessary qualities will be lacking, either in the near or the distant future.

‘It would be pleasant just now to look forward and think of all the good work which will be done on this spot; yet awhile, I sincerely trust, by ourselves, and in years to come by others who are to follow us and carry it on in the same keen and zealous spirit. But this is not the time to indulge in mere day-dreams. The present moment plainly and sternly tells us that it must be ours to earn and keep the confidence, esteem and friendship of all those who love and who would uphold the honour of English music.

‘Ours to realise the great privilege we enjoy in being joined to others in a united endeavour to heighten its value, to press on its happily increasing recognition, and to firmly establish its future renown.

‘Ladies and Gentlemen,—Lest I be tempted to say more, I shall take the liberty of breaking in upon the solemnity of this auspicious occasion, and call upon our fellow-students in music, and this assemblage generally, to exercise their vocal powers and give three ringing cheers for the old and the new Royal Academy of Music.’

The following selection of music: Overture, 'Richard III.' (German); Grand March, 'Imperial' (Neville Flux); incidental music, 'Henry VIII.' (Sullivan); Overture, 'The golden dawn' (Corder), and the accompaniments to the hymns—'Angel-voices, ever singing' and 'Now thank we all our God'—were played by the Royal Artillery Band, under the direction of Mr. R. Neville Flux. An eight-part choral song, 'My soul would drink those echoes,' especially composed for the occasion by Sir Alexander Mackenzie, was sung with impressive effect by a choir of students.

The annual distribution of prizes took place at the Scala Theatre on July 21. Mrs. E. E. Cooper performed the ceremony.

DR. BUCK ON THE VALUE OF MUSICAL LEARNING.

Dr. Percy Buck, the newly-appointed Professor of Music at Dublin University, gave his first public lecture in that capacity at Trinity College on June 27. His subject was 'The value of musical learning,' which he discussed in abstract and general terms and with an elegance of diction that widened his appeal beyond the circle of the musically gifted. The substance of his remarks was as follows:

What does the Art of Music owe to learning, and, whatever the debt may be, would the art be better or worse without it? The debt is overwhelming and unpayable; it has never been repudiated by any considerable musician; and the present chaotic condition of musical production and criticism is due very largely to the restiveness and insincerity of those who, in disowning the slow and laborious development of past centuries, are playing unconsciously the part of Mrs. Partington by their denial of the whole principle of evolution. It must be admitted that in the past the attitude of the normal learned musician has been too often conservative to the point of stagnation. Beethoven, Schumann, Wagner, Brahms, to mention a few, were condemned, and some lived to see their persecutors dismissed in ridicule. The fault of their detractors was that they were exclusively men of learning. To-day, however, it would be difficult to name any man of learning to whom is attached the discredit of stagnation.

There are those who do not love the somewhat overbearing blattancy of Strauss, or the often perverse ingenuity of Max Reger, or even the twilight harmonies of Debussy; but if any critic were to found his disapproval on the fact that in enlarging boundaries the fences had been broken (and this was the beginning and end of the charges against Beethoven, for example), then such a critic would have to hand in his credentials amid universal laughter. Music, like almost every other branch of human activity, is both a Science and an Art. The duties of a musical scientist are two-fold. He may be a pioneer, or he may fill the humbler rôle of collating the works of the creators as soon as the experiments of the greater minds have been crystallized into idiom for ordinary usage. Even were we to grant that musical learning had rendered no service beyond the collation or systematic arrangement of knowledge, is there not a case to be made out for it? It has been abused for the invention of pettifoggery rules; yet, though rules have been laid down with indiscriminating assurance and held to with inartistic pertinacity, what is a rule in music or in anything else but an induction from the best usage? Without discriminating exegesis the work of genius will either bear no seed, or else will raise that most sterile of all crops, a school of imitators, who reproduce the eccentricity of their model without divining his inspiration. On the scientific side alone it is as necessary to take stock of one's position in art as in commerce. It requires men learned in the best sense to do so, and that did no other merit attach to them they would, by this one duty, justify their existence and discredit the somewhat contemptuous estimation in which they have been held.

Music is, and must remain for ever, primarily an appeal to the emotions; but that appeal must always be, as it always has been, under conscious and intelligent direction and control. A composer does not draw his work from his brain as you pull a thread of silk from a cocoon; no work, however inspired, issues from the human mind fully and finally equipped. For a composition is inevitably twofold—it consists of an idea plus a development. Of more it may and generally does consist, but this is the irreducible minimum; and whether we are dealing with a Ninth Symphony or with a simple chant there must be originally an idea, and subsequently a deliberate arrangement and subordination of the whole to its adequate presentation and development. No one really denies this, not even those iconoclasts who flock to the standard of any new musical prophet, provided only he disowns the past. But what these anarchists fail to see is the dilemma which is so apparent to the wider view. Granted that music is an emotional appeal made consciously intelligent, we may admit their claim that no mere exhibition of learning, however interesting, can possibly be in itself beautiful or desirable qua music; but they must admit our claim that the same conclusion is true of any music which, divorced from intellectual control, makes its appeal to the emotions alone. For it is only the directed and purposeful effort of man that can take an idea and so clothe it with flesh and blood that a living organism emerges from what might have remained only a beautiful mask. Learning and theory, of the right kind, are no analytical device whereby the essence of genius is extracted and the tyro taught to manipulate the tricks of the trade. Rather do they, as I claimed at first, collate the works of genius, show you how the great minds worked, and sow seed which, though condemned by its detractors for failing to raise up fresh genius—a task it never set itself—is yet responsible for all criticism which can be called true, and all appreciation which can be called discriminating. Musical learning is not a question of figured basses, of fugue and canon and double counterpoint—these are the mere grammar to be assimilated before a student can be called equipped as a craftsman and assayer. They train the mind in dealing in the rough with the materials of which works of art are made: they systematize knowledge so that it can with sureness dissociate the false and true. Without this equipment in some degree one's opinions on music become mere personal predilections, worthless and haphazard obiter dicta. Why is it that so few have any glimmering of the essential difference between good and bad music? Why is it that people confound the dull with the good, and take it for granted that a heavy oratorio is probably 'better' music than a light comic opera? It is because the musical education of most people, including even the bulk of professional musicians, has been on its theoretical side a mere filling the mind with facts in a manner exactly equivalent to putting them into cold storage. Facts, to become learning, must be co-ordinated, and learning, to become fertile, must be applied, re-adjusted and imparted. For a human being's value in this world, as far as the Goddess of Learning is concerned, is simply his value as a passer-on or a distributor of knowledge as opposed to a pigeon-hole of isolated facts.

It is often asked by those interested in music but not technically conversant with its developments, what is the main battle-ground of the struggle now going on between the old and the new? It is undoubtedly the question of what is known as 'Form' or 'Design.' There is a passage in De Quincey's 'Essay on Conversation' which will illustrate the direction of this contest. He is contrasting the different methods of setting forth a subject, and takes, as his two typical exponents, Johnson and Burke. With Dr. Johnson, he says, you feel that the scheme of presentation had been so carefully thought out that, when the statement is finished, there has been said nothing which was not in the speaker's mind at the outset. That is, in music, of course, the method of the accepted classical model, Beethoven. With Burke, on the other hand, we have the method of flashing improvisation. Starting with a given topic, and with perhaps a definite preconceived attitude towards it, Burke would throw a brilliant searchlight on to one facet of the subject after another, until some overpoweringly eloquent climax was reached, making the whole organic by the fact that each thought followed the last in logical sequence, but giving the impression that each burning sentence had been welded on the spur of the moment, and that the creation had taken place in front of you, not, as in the case of Dr. Johnson, before even the preamble. That is, I take it, roughly the method of Tchaikovsky. No doubt, theorists were in the last century too narrow, in that they demanded

Musical score for the song "Summer" (Sommer) by Franz Schubert. The score is in G major, 3/4 time, and consists of five systems of music. The first system shows the vocal melody (treble clef) and piano accompaniment (treble and bass clefs). The lyrics are: "summer are fill - - - ing the air." The tempo is marked "poco a poco." and the dynamics are "ppp" (pianissimo) and "meno mosso." (less movement). The second system continues the vocal melody and piano accompaniment. The lyrics are: "whis-pers, whis-pers of summer are fill-ing the air. . ." The tempo is marked "poco a poco." and the dynamics are "ppp" (pianissimo) and "meno mosso." (less movement). The third system continues the vocal melody and piano accompaniment. The lyrics are: "whis-pers, whis-pers of summer are fill-ing the air. . ." The tempo is marked "poco a poco." and the dynamics are "ppp" (pianissimo) and "meno mosso." (less movement). The fourth system continues the vocal melody and piano accompaniment. The lyrics are: "whis-pers, whis-pers of summer are fill-ing the air. . ." The tempo is marked "poco a poco." and the dynamics are "ppp" (pianissimo) and "meno mosso." (less movement). DR. BUCK ON THE VALUE OF MUSICAL LEARNING—an almost servile obedience to the methods of Johnson and Beethoven, and are now right in recognising the logical structure in the other process.

Musical learning presents yet another aspect in its value as a moral discipline. We have all come across the young pianist who, though anxious to attain efficiency, declines the drudgery of technical practice in the vain hope that some short cut to skill will miraculously appear. Whatever pity or sympathy we may have for such a one, we can have little belief in the real earnestness of an ambition which refuses to undergo the necessary toil: and we further recognise that such a character is the very one that is in want of the discipline which the dignity of effort brings in its train.

To adapt a passage from the philosopher William James, theoretical as much as practical work in music engenders a habit of observation, a knowledge of the difference between accuracy and vagueness, an insight into nature's complexity, and into the inadequacy of written signs to express completely the composer's conception, which, once wrought into the mind, remain there as lifelong possessions. It confers precision, because if you are writing down a chord you must make it definitely right or definitely wrong; and it gives honesty, because when you express yourself by making a thing instead of talking about it, it becomes impossible to dissimulate your vagueness or ignorance by ambiguity. Musical learning has been not always in the past on the side of progress; but there will always be a need for it so long as it recognises that its sphere is not dictatorial but auxiliary. For we must remember that whilst every step of progress is necessarily a step forward on the main road, yet, in all branches of life, innumerable steps forward are made which afterwards prove to have been along barren side tracks, or, if on the main road, have to be painfully retraced. And if we are not to be at the mercy of every plausible charlatan, of every brilliant anarchist, and of every misguided genius, what can save us so surely as a body of solid opinion disseminated through the land, learned without being dry-as-dust, liberal without being gullible, conservative without being stagnant? Such a time of crisis has, in the judgment of not a few, now arrived, and a good part of Europe would seem, musically, to be losing its head. Yet many, if not most, music-lovers, however open-armed to new sensations, would not willingly see every landmark removed and every idol dethroned; and to such I appeal for a consideration of those more moderate views which, even in these days of extremes, cannot disown the whole evolution and development of that Art which is at once our mistress and our handmaid.

THE WESLEY COMMEMORATION SERVICE.

WESTMINSTER ABBEY, ST. PETER'S DAY, JUNE 29.

This memorable service, given in honour of one of England's greatest musical worthies, Samuel Sebastian Wesley, was well designed, and was carried out with due dignity. A special choir, which included many well-known musicians and amateurs, was organized and rehearsed by Sir Frederick Bridge. A large and representative congregation attended, and it was obvious that the whole service made a deep impression.

The selection of music was an admirably representative one. It was not possible to include all Wesley's masterpieces and satisfy all tastes. But some regret is permissible that so typical an example of his genius as the anthem 'Wash me thoroughly' was not chosen.

The opening voluntary was an Andante in E flat, from the set of pieces composed by Wesley for a chamber organ, and dedicated to Lady Acland. This was sympathetically played by Dr. Alcock, who accompanied throughout the service. The anthems, 'O Lord, my God' (unaccompanied) and 'Ascribe unto the Lord' were next very finely sung. The service proper was shortened from the order given in the book by commencing at the first Lord's Prayer, and the versicles and responses were sung according to Tallis's festival use.

Psalms lxxviii. and cl. were set respectively to a chant in D, by Wesley, and the 'Grand chant' ('Mr. Pelham Humphry'), the version of the latter being in accordance with an MS. of the Restoration period in the British Museum.

For the Magnificat and Nunc dimittis, Wesley's fine setting in E was, of course, selected. After the third Collect three anthems were sung: 'All go unto one place,' 'Cast me not away,' and 'The Wilderness.' The impressive and truly poetic character of the first-named anthem was fully realised. With the grief of a nation's loss still clinging around all hearts, and the tombs of its illustrious dead before all eyes, this anthem struck a peculiarly significant and soul-stirring note. The immortal 'Wilderness' of necessity found a place in the scheme. The full choral portions were well sung, but some of the solo and quartet portions of the anthem were disappointing.

After an address by the sub-Dean, which we report below, the great anthem 'O Lord, Thou art my God' was given. This was the composer's 'exercise' on taking his accumulated degrees of Bachelor and Doctor of Music at Oxford, in 1839, and is justly considered a monument of artistic conception and contrapuntal skill. The remaining numbers of the selection were the well-known Easter anthem, 'Blessed be the God and Father,' the hymn 'Brief life is here our portion,' to the well-known tune 'Aurelia,' and the anthem 'Praise the Lord, O my soul.' After the Blessing a four-fold Amen, adapted by Sir Frederick Bridge from Wesley for the service, was impressively sung, and while the immense congregation dispersed, Dr. J. K. Pyne (of Manchester) played the Introduction and Fugue in C sharp minor. Unfortunately, however, the effect of a great portion of this fine piece was somewhat marred by an obstinate cipher.

It remains to add that Sir Frederick Bridge conducted throughout the service with his usual energy and decision, and that the tasteful and finely-played organ accompaniments of Dr. Alcock were a memorable feature.

RECITAL OF WESLEY'S ORGAN COMPOSITIONS.

A most appropriate and interesting adjunct to the service was provided in the form of an organ recital from the works of the composer, which took place at the Abbey in the evening.

In these days, when recital programmes exhibit somewhat too decided a tendency to lighter forms of organ composition and to orchestral transcriptions, Wesley's pieces are none too frequently heard. It was a great pleasure, therefore, to lovers of the more solid style of music, to spend a profitable hour in listening to them on this occasion.

With a keen sense of the fitness of things, Sir Frederick Bridge had invited the co-operation at the recital of well-known organists who were either former pupils of Wesley, or who are at present holders of cathedral and church appointments with which he was identified. Former pupils were represented by Dr. J. K. Pyne (of Manchester) and Mr. T. E. Aylward (of Cardiff, and formerly of Llandaff and Chichester); while the cathedral and church appointments were represented by Dr. G. R. Sinclair (Hereford), Dr. E. C. Bairstow (Leeds Parish Church), Dr. W. Prendergast (Winchester), and Dr. A. H. Brewer (Gloucester).

These gentlemen, with Sir Frederick Bridge and Dr. Alcock (Chapel Royal, and assistant-organist of the Abbey), ably performed an interesting programme to a large and attentive body of listeners, which included many well-known organists and other members of the musical profession. The abilities of some of the performers are too well known to require any comment, but as Mr. Aylward is seldom heard in London, we may say that we were not a little impressed with his sympathetic and temperamental rendering of the beautiful Andante cantabile in G.

Dr. Alcock's well-wrought and clever extemporization on themes from the anthems 'Praise the Lord, O my soul' and 'Wash me thoroughly' is also worthy of special mention.

The full programme was as follows:

The sub-Dean of the Abbey, Dr. Robinson Duckworth, chose for his text: 'Let us now praise famous men . . . such as thought out musical tunes and set forth verses in writing.' After tracing the history and achievements of Samuel Sebastian Wesley's ancestors, Dr. Duckworth said that the late Edward Dannreuther had described the brilliant father and son as 'by far the weightiest composers who wrote for the Anglican Church service at a period when English music in general was at a low ebb.' 'They tower,' he said, 'above all their contemporaries, and in their particular department, in which they are by no means imitators, they need not shun comparison with Continental celebrities such as Spohr, or even with such a master as Mendelssohn.'

Of Samuel Sebastian Wesley's personality much might be said, for it was of no ordinary type. He was conspicuously endowed with the strenuous qualities of his family, and therefore not a very tractable member of the cathedral bodies to which he belonged, for he had set his heart upon drastic reforms and changes, some of which were no doubt needed, and he was impatient of delay or opposition. Consequently his life was too often embittered by collision with Deans and Chapters, precentors and publishers. Those, however, who were admitted to intimate acquaintance have borne witness to the genuine kindness of his nature, the wide range of his knowledge, and the charms of his conversation. In Exeter Cathedral there was a tablet to his memory inscribed with these words: 'This monument has been placed here by friends as an expression of high esteem for his personal worth, and in admiration of his great musical genius.' But a greater monument than any which friends could erect he had created for himself in the imperishable works which he had left behind.

Samuel Sebastian Wesley was born in London on August 14, 1810. He died at Gloucester on April 19, 1876, aged sixty-five. A long sketch of his life, with two portraits, appeared in the Musical Times for May, June and July, 1900.

YORK MUSICAL FESTIVAL, JULY 20, 21.

As York has not held a musical festival since 1835, the scheme worked out so admirably this year may be regarded as a new one. Given a commodious arena for performances on a large scale, a first-rate chorus, a fine professional symphony orchestra, the best of British solo singers, a distinguished pianist, an astutely devised programme calculated to satisfy a large conservative clientele and yet to provide some interest for the blasé critic, a highly capable local conductor aided by some of the best-known British composers, and a large well-to-do class to appeal to for financial support and personal attendance, and we have the factors which go to the making of a successful festival, all of which were happily in evidence at York.

Mr. T. Tertius Noble, as everyone knows, is the organist at the Minster, and it was he who set the ball rolling. He is entitled to much congratulation on the result of his labours.

The choir consisted of about 400 voices, and was, we understand, formed entirely from local resources: a fact that is a striking tribute to the musical capacity of the district. The tone was on the whole fine and blendful. Each part was well equipped, and in turn distinguished itself. The basses seemed relatively somewhat deficient in sonority and richness. The execution was always very musically and fluent, and revealed highly capable training. There were not many thrilling moments or much high colour in great climaxes; in fact, some restraint seemed to be intentional. The band was excellent. The Queen's Hall Orchestra supplied the wind, and the strings were mainly furnished by the best northern orchestras. Mr. Rawdon Briggs was the leader. The soloists were Madame Agnes Nicholls, Miss Phyllis Lett, Mr. Gervase Elwes, Mr. Herbert Brown, and, for the pianoforte concertos, Miss Fanny Davies.

All the performances were held in a great hall used ordinarily for exhibitions. This arena provided ample accommodation, and, what was very welcome, plenty of space and fresh air. But it cannot be said that it was acoustically an ideal apartment. In accordance with a custom difficult to upset, the expensive seats were the worst and the cheap seats the best for hearing.

Four concerts were given on the two days. At the first the programme was miscellaneous. It was largely an Elgar selection, inasmuch as four of the seven items were his compositions, namely, Overture 'Cockaigne,' 'Enigma variations' (very finely played), the 'Sea-pictures' songs (which served to display Miss Lett's fine voice and style), and the 'Wand of youth' (No. 2) suite. The composer conducted. Miss Fanny Davies gave a charming performance of Mozart's G major (Köchel 453) Pianoforte concerto, Bach's Concerto in G for strings was played, and Mr. Herbert Brown sang with great effect a 'Song of the Genie' for baritone and orchestra, composed by Mr. Granville Bantock to words written by Helen F. Bantock.

On the evening of July 20, 'Elijah' was given before an immense audience. The performance does not call for special remark. With such resources and an alert conductor the work went smoothly, and created its customary effect.

On the morning of the second day the concert was entirely orchestral, and only one piece of new music was brought forward. Beethoven's 'Leonora' (No. 3) overture, Schubert's 'Unfinished' and Wagner's 'Tannhäuser' overture were all well played, and an exceptionally fine performance of Schumann's Pianoforte concerto was given by Miss Fanny Davies. The novelty was a setting, for tenor solo and orchestra, of Tennyson's poem 'The dying swan,' by Dr. Hathaway, who conducted. The music displayed some expressive power and musicianship, and the solo was well sung by Mr. Elwes. The remaining number was Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 5, in E minor, which was also successfully presented. Mr. Noble conducted, and exhibited his capacity as an orchestral chief.

At the final concert given on the evening of the second day, the chief work performed was Elgar's 'King Olaf,' a cantata in which the composer has embodied some of his most powerful and imaginative thoughts. The performance under the composer was an excellent one, although now and then the chorus-singing seemed formal. A suite of dramatic dances, by Granville Bantock, was performed for the first time under the composer. The dances are distinguished by the names Snake, Sappho, Veil and Dagger. All four were announced for performance, but the second was omitted. Those that were heard displayed Professor Bantock's elegant and delicate fancy in orchestration to great advantage. Each dance has a poetic basis of much interest, which is admirably mirrored in the music.

The last item on the programme was a selection from the York Pageant music composed by Mr. Noble. This included instrumental movements and choruses. The music displayed the facility and musicianship of the composer, and very happily concluded the festival.

THE BEECHAM OPERA SEASON.

HIS MAJESTY'S THEATRE.

Since our last report of this opera season, the chief works produced have been Mozart's 'Così fan tutte,' Johann Strauss's farcical opera 'Die Fledermaus,' and most notably Richard Strauss's 'Feuersnot.' Mr. Beecham is evidently a man of his word, and is determined to live up to his very attractive prospectus.

'COSÌ FAN TUTTE' (THEY ALL DO IT).

This is one of the lightest of Mozart's dramatic works. The libretto deals with a farcical story in which the constancy of two sisters is tried by their lovers disguising themselves as new suitors. The music is as merry as the story, and the whole work provides delightful entertainment. The dialogue of the English version used was by Mr. Percy Greenbank, and the words of the lyrics were those by the Rev. Marmaduke Browne, printed in Novello's edition. The opera was produced on June 27, under the personal direction of Mr. Beecham, with the following admirable cast:

Isidora	Sisters: Ladies of Ferrara	.. Ruth Vincent.
Dorabella		.. Lena Maitland.
Despina, their waiting maid	..	Beatrice La Palme,
Ferrando, an Officer, in love with Dorabella	..	Walter Hyde.
Gratiano, an Officer, in love with Isidora	..	Frederic Austin.
Don Alfonso, an old philosopher	..	Lewys James,

The performance was first-rate in every particular. The ladies concerned showed their capacity to enter into the style of Mozart's beautiful music, and Mr. Walter Hyde and Mr. Frederic Austin not only sang well, but lived up to the humour of their parts so successfully as to excite roars of laughter. All the refinement and delicacy of the orchestral music was manifest under Mr. Beecham's dexterous and highly rhythmical style of conducting.

‘DIE FLEDERMAUS’ (THE BAT).

This amusing and attractive opera was composed by the celebrated waltz-writer in 1874. Since that time it has been performed on countless occasions on the Continent, and it was also produced—not very successfully—in England about fifteen years ago, by the Coburg Court Theatre Company, at Drury Lane. The Beecham company performed the opera for the first time on July 4. The plot is farcical, and makes unusual demands upon the theory of the law of probability, but all the same it provides excellent vent for Johannes Strauss's facile and melodious powers. Mr. Alfred Kalisch has provided an entertaining English version. The music, which never strains the attention, is full of delightful melody and the charm of flowing rhythm. The orchestration verges upon the obvious, but it is always smooth and lucid. The cast was a strong one, the exponents of the principal characters being Miss Carrie Tubb (Rosalinde), Miss Beatrice La Palme (Adele), Miss Muriel Terry (Orlofsky), Mr. Joseph O'Mara (Von Eisenstein), Mr. Frederick Ranaow (Dr. Falke) and Mr. Walter Passmore (Frank, the Governor of the prison).

The performance was an all-round excellent one. Miss Tubb especially distinguished herself in the elaborate Hungarian song that is such an attractive feature in the brilliant ball-room scene, and, throughout, Miss La Palme was a vivacious actress and a clever singer. It is possible to feel some regret that so much of the humour of the parts taken by Mr. O'Mara and Mr. Passmore depends upon the simulation of bibulousness, but there can be no question of the irresistible drollery of the last-named artist. A pas seul by Vivian Tailleux and some ballet dances were very great additions to the spectacle. Mr. Hamish McCunn conducted.

‘FEUERSNOT’ (BELTANE FAKE).

The first performance of this much talked-of opera in this country, which was given on July 9, attracted a distinguished audience of musical folk. The libretto of the opera is by Ernst von Wolzogen, and the chief male character, Kunrad, is a portrait of Strauss himself. The scene is laid in Munich in legendary times, and the allegorical plot is written round the festivities associated with Midsummer Eve or St John's Eve, when it was customary to light bonfires. The children are collecting material for the blaze, and apply at the house of a recluse (Kunrad), who is addicted to necromancy. He astonishes the townsfolk by encouraging the demolition of his house by the children. He is smitten by Diemut, the Burgomaster's daughter, who is watching the proceedings, and to her intense dismay he kisses her before the crowd. In shame she retires to her home, and is pursued by Kunrad, who endeavours to persuade her to let him enter. After much colloquy she pretends to consent, and hoists him up in a basket attached to a wheel. She leaves him dangling half-way up, and then mocks him. The populace come and add to the ridicule. Kunrad, now infuriated, exerts his occult powers, and immediately all the lights and fires are extinguished. Diemut then yields herself to Kunrad, the fires and lights are restored and everybody is happy. The music is always intensely interesting, although it not infrequently fails to appeal to the sense of the beautiful. No doubt Strauss is a law to himself; but on any theory it is hard to understand why the vocal music of this opera should so often be outrageously difficult. Even the children's choruses belong to the ‘impossible’ category. That there are splendid passages in the work no one sensitive to music can deny. Kunrad's soliloquy on things in general, and the iniquity of Munich's treatment of Wagner in particular, the magnificent love-duet between Kunrad and Diemut, and the glow and significance of the orchestral colouring, and many other features, show the composer at his best: yet one can scarcely avoid the feeling that the work as a whole is not an artistic success.

At the first performance the two principal characters were taken by Mr. Oster (Kunrad) and Miss Maude Fay (Diemut). At later performances Mr. Frederic Austin and Miss Edith Evans were even more successful in these parts.

MUSIC AT THE BOURNEMOUTH CENTENARY FÊTES.

(FROM OUR SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT.)

Bournemouth, in a birth-centenary popular festival held after months of preparation on a scale quite unprecedented in modern English life, staked all on ten days' fine weather—from July 6 to July 16—and got it to a hair's breadth. When July 6 arrived the local weatherwise foresaw success, for that night the wind came from the north-west, while the moon was new. But those who guaranteed or underwrote £30,000 wagered on the unknown and unknowable in weather. As a matter of fact, one left torrential rain in a muddy London, to find the sun shining through particles of opal ether in a beautiful and spick-and-span Bournemouth. This glamorous atmosphere, rather than hot sunshine, continued throughout the festivities and had a peculiar, magical effect on sensibility. One can give here little more than a bare catalogue of the phases of ten-day revelry. There were military tournaments, held in a natural wooded amphitheatre, and on the sword instead of on the tan. There were grotesque processions, always accompanied by confetti battles, in the manner of Nice; with their great cars exhibiting humorous allegory, with their fifteen-feet high big-head satirical figures nodding along in parties, with their comic cavalcades, with their numberless whimsically got-up pedestrians. There were ‘quarter-deck’ balls on the pier and masked balls in the covered skating-rink. There were athletic meetings and Young-England meetings. There were motor-car ‘gymkhanas’ and motor-boat regattas. There was a six-day meeting for aeroplane-flying at a vast specially-levelled aerodrome on the banks of the Stour, dwarfing the hippodrome of ancient Olympia; a meeting which to multitudes was a revelation of this marvellous new thing in human effort, and which surpassed all previous English displays of the kind: the dragon-like purring of the upward-soaring machines haunts the memory. The proceedings, as we all know, were marred by fatal disaster. There were generous banquets. The town itself was a garden of colour by day and of illumination by night; and 10,000 union jacks flew from masts, gable-ends and balconies. Above all, at Bournemouth's birthday party, a happy populace, which I should estimate in hundreds of thousands, put themselves heart and soul into the hands of King Pierrot and showed that England can still be ‘Merrie England,’ with abundance of fun, while free from license.

The music which accompanied all this was here, there, and everywhere. There were full military bands (Coldstream Guards, Lieut. Mackenzie Rogan, and 7th Hussars, Mr. James Slattery), playing each three times a day. There were for the first time in England the bag-pipers of the Inniskilling Fusiliers, from Omagh dépôt, co. Tyrone, playing (in trousers, alas!) on the Irish or ‘Union’ pipes, which may be more musical, but are certainly less stirring than rough Scottish Highland bag-pipes echoing from mountain-side to mountain-side. There were ‘Bohemian orchestras’ for ball work and garden work, and sundry small bands at different sites. There were various entertainment parties, including a jodelling party from the Bavarian Highlands, a Royal Welsh Male Choir, cafés chantants and military ‘grand tattoos’ (Rogan), otherwise massed band serenades, with eight bands and 300 torch-bearers. Finally and principally, grand orchestral and vocal concerts were given once a day at the Winter Gardens Pavilion. All these operations were controlled, co-ordinated and directed by Mr. Dan Godfrey, who has performed thus the most arduous, comprehensive and important function, so far, of his life.

At the Winter Garden concerts the chief solo-singers were Melba, Agnes Nicholls, Susan Strong, Edna Thornton, Alice Verlet, Margaret Cooper, Robert Maitland, Plunket Greene, and Kennerley Rumford; the chief instrumentalists were Backhaus, Mischa Elman, Myra Hess, Zimbalist, and Moisevitich. I cannot here distinguish between admirable artists. Clara Butt and Pachmann, who had been engaged, were prevented by illness from attending. As exhibiting at its best the playing or accompanying of the admirable Winter Gardens Orchestra, under the baton of Mr. Dan Godfrey, who has developed a great sensibility, and apart from any personal predilection as to works, the following pieces made the chief impression on me in the course of the concerts, all of which I attended: Beethoven's fifth Symphony, Brahms's 'Students' Festival' overture, Mackenzie's Benedictus, Massenet's Scène religieuse, Mendelssohn's Violin concerto, Schumann's Pianoforte concerto, Sibelius's Valse triste, Strauss's Don Juan, Svendsen's 'Norwegian carnival', Wagner's Vorspiel and Liebsteod, Wallace's Villon. Altogether seventy-six large pieces with orchestra were done at these festival concerts.

BOURNEMOUTH MUNICIPAL ORCHESTRA AND COMPOSERS PRESENT AT THE CENTenary FÊTES, JULY, 1910.

As entire concerts, the most important were the Wagner concert of July 15 and the all-British concert of July 8. At the former were sung Wagner's four seldom-heard early songs (1838-1840), beautiful in themselves but quite ineffectively scored, except the last one, 'Attente,' by Felix Mottl. The success of the complete Finale from 'Valkyrie,' as rendered with full poetic force by Susan Strong and Robert Maitland, was a sufficient answer to the cant which would ban such extracts in the concert-room. At the all-British concert the following works were done, the living composers conducting their own: Sullivan's Macbeth Overture (1888), Parry's characteristic variations (1897), Mackenzie's Burns rhapsody (1881), Stanford's Irish rhapsody (1902), Elgar's 'Pomp and Circumstance' March in D, and second 'Wand of Youth' Suite (1908), Edward German's Welsh rhapsody (1904). No such complete representation of our leading orchestral composers has before been offered in a single concert. That a tightly-packed house should be drawn by these names, should listen in absorbed silence, and should rapturously applaud every item, is a sign of the times, as well as a tribute to the education received by the Winter Gardens audiences through the daily Municipal Orchestra. A photograph taken on the occasion is given on the preceding page.

It is just fifteen years since Mr. Dan Godfrey started the Symphony Concerts, almost exactly sixty a year, with which twice a week in thirty weeks of each year he accentuates the performance of his orchestra, thus playing, with a very short midsummer vacation, daily throughout the year. The omnivorousness of his programmes, and the determined way in which he has presented our indigenous orchestral music, are by this time fairly well known. In the 910 ordinary Symphony Concerts down to last May, 1,263 separate works, old and new, have been performed, of which 267 have been of symphonic rank. There has been a Beethoven symphony at 147 concerts, a Brahms at sixty-five, a Tchaikovsky at fifty-two, a Schumann at fifty, and so forth. Out of the 1,263 separate works, not less than 454 have been by 129 British composers. What is less known is that Mr. Dan Godfrey has for several years past been driven by the gadfly of emulative conducting virtuosity. His daily duties will have placed him at the conductor's stand not less than 750 times a year, and on each occasion he will have conducted about eight separate works. That makes 6,000 items a year, or 90,000 items in 15 years, in respect of which the ear has acted focus under conditions of receptive, critical and administrative attention. It is this which constitutes the habitual conductor a specialist, and differentiates him from the composer who conducts just now and then. Briefly, Mr. Dan Godfrey takes enormous pains with the finish of his band, and it is this, even more than the omnivorousness of the programmes, which makes it the model of provincial orchestras. No wonder then that music has been one of the most important features in the recent Bournemouth fêtes.

STRAUSS'S 'FEUERSNOT.'

On another page we notice the production of this opera by Mr. Beecham. The following extracts from the criticisms on the work that have appeared in the daily Press, show that its value as music is appraised very differently by experienced critics.

There is nothing in the music to repel the most old-fashioned listener; the music is full of melodic grace. . . . There are two waltz tunes which have a certain amount of entrain. What the opening scene of the children collecting wood for the bonfire, with all the little dialogues between different groups, would have become in the hands of the authors of 'Die Meistersinger' or of 'Falstaff' may be guessed; the action hangs fire terribly for the first half of the work.—The Times.

In 'Feuersnot' there is a great deal of feverish and strenuous music in the orchestra, but only on rare occasions does it produce a stimulating effect. On the contrary, the noise is often as not repels rather than compels attention. All the beauty and passion in 'Feuersnot' is heard in the orchestra rather than on the stage, and all its music is summarised in the symphonic interlude that follows Kunrad's address. The vast majority of the solo music is ungrateful.—Standard.

To the modern ear, the symphonic commentary is full of melody, and the vocal writing is often of the utmost beauty. Such dissonances and Straussian asperities as there are only serve as a foil to the beauty of the rest of the music. The thematic material, if economical in its supply, is stronger and simpler than usual with Strauss, and this gives the polyphony a more marked design or pattern.—Daily News.

The children's choruses as they collect faggots for the bonfires are of a haunting charm, and not less so is the waltz they dance. Polyphony can never have been seen in a less alarming guise than here, where the gaiety and frivolity of style seem to have borrowed a leaf out of the other Strauss's book.—Sunday Times.

The idea of this amalgamation of purely orchestral interest with dramatic and vocal attachments is in itself an excellent one, and seems to me a logical development of the symphonic poem rather than a development of the accepted operatic medium of musical expression. The drawback—and it is a serious one—in the case of Strauss's conception is his persistently 'wicked' demands on the resources of the singer. The instrumental score of 'Feuersnot' is a sheer and superb success, and the association of the music with the stage movement is never for a moment to be disputed.—Observer.

But though the influence of Wagner is continually felt, the music could have been written by no one but Strauss—and often it is Strauss at his best. In richness of harmony, in wealth of orchestral resource, in vivid touches of characterization, in subtle power of romantic suggestion, and often in sheer freshness and beauty of melody, it is one of his finest and most inspiring works.—Daily Graphic.

His use of the folk-song of his native Bavaria in a work that is nothing else than a sublimated symphonic poem is surely new, or was so when 'Feuersnot' was produced some nine years ago. In Strauss's later operas the symphonic poem idea seems even more emphasised, but 'Feuersnot' set the key, as it were. And how superbly symphonic is the orchestra! We shall hear, no doubt, many a bitter cry as to the unvocality of much of the music that is to be sung, and it cannot be denied that there is truth in the complaint.—Daily Telegraph.

Then follow the two choruses already referred to, and an orchestral interlude of wonderful graphic power in which the uneasiness of the crowd in the dark and the growing passion in the hearts of the unseen lovers are suggested with masterly skill, while few things in Strauss are more significant and from the technical point of view more masterly than the sudden glow of gorgeous orchestral colour at the climax. . . . The fugue sung during the darkness and the final chorus after the lecture given to the people by Kunrad from the balcony are among the most dramatic pieces of choral writing in all operatic literature, because for all their complexity they seem wholly spontaneous. The solo sung by Diemut from her balcony, in which she expresses her resentment at the insult Kunrad had inflicted, and the mysterious longing caused by the mystic influence of the Subend (Midsummer Eve), has few equals in modern music for languorous, sensuous beauty.—Morning Leader.

Many times Strauss appears to have over-weighed his theme; on the present occasion by the elaborate, nay even prodigal, indulgence in the musical decorative art. . . . Mr. Thomas Beecham and his forces did ample justice to the acroamatic nature of the score, which makes its appeal to the intellect rather than to the emotions. Herein Richard Strauss wends his pilgrimage a long way back in the wake of the composer of the Venusberg music in 'Tannhäuser,' though he has embellished his work with a wealth of captivating melody, and placed an estoteric reliance on modern harmonies and intervals.—Yorkshire Post.

As to the music of 'Feuersnot,' while not beyond criticism, its interest and beauty are undeniable. It is notable equally for the charm of its melodies, the brilliance of its orchestration, and the originality and individuality which pervade it throughout. . . . Strauss rather recalls, at times, a brilliant conjurer who performs the most astonishing tricks, but does them so quickly that no one can take them in properly. . . . But when all deductions have been made, the rare quality of the music is incontestable enough. Certainly, there is no other composer writing for the stage to-day who has given the world anything like it.—Westminster Gazette.

The score is full of pleasing themes, handled, of course, with a great mastery of orchestral colour. The little love-duet is charming in its very Straussian way; indeed, throughout the composer's style is readily recognisable. If there is less sense for characterization than is shown in 'Elektra,' the nature of the text scarcely gives the same scope. Possibly the ensembles and choruses are the most attractive parts at a first hearing.—Pall Mall Gazette.

The opera is full of lovely music. The terrible Strauss unbends whenever he thinks of children or young people, and into their mouths he puts some of the most charming strains imaginable. The refrain of the children, the trio of Diemut's companions as they steal on in the basket scene, the chorus 'O Diemut, du thöricht einfältig Kind' (a reminiscence of an earlier trio), and a dozen other things of the kind, are inexpressibly delicious. There are two waltzes that would do credit to the great Johann himself. All through the opera the characterization is excellent, and the music is woven in long, sequential pictures that contrast strikingly with the more discontinuous manner and thematic brevity of some of Strauss's later works.—Birmingham Daily Post.

STRAUSSES, OLD AND NEW.

It is obvious that confusion exists, even in some musical circles, as to the identity and relationship of the many Strausses who have earned fame in the musical world. A lady who ought to have known better recently observed that Strauss's 'Feuersnot' represented a considerable advance upon his 'Fledermaus'; and a certain element of the commonplace in some of Richard Strauss's tunes gives a show of reason to the supposition that he was once a composer of drawing-room waltzes. We hope that the following particulars will help to dissipate such errors and delusions.

LUDWIG STRAUSS (born 1835; died 1899) was a violin and viola player of the first rank. He led the Philharmonic and Hallé Orchestras, was solo violinist to Queen Victoria, and was closely associated with the Saturday and Monday Popular Concerts as a quartet player.

JOHANN STRAUSS the elder (born 1804, at Vienna; died 1849) was a famous composer of dance music, and earned the title of father of the Viennese waltz. From an early age his life was devoted to music. His violin and viola playing led to his association with a string quartet, and the conductorship of a small orchestra at places of amusement. In the latter capacity he found an opening for his talent as a composer with immediate success. His band became much in demand, and increased in numbers. The years 1833 to 1838 were occupied with European tours, which brought him to London at the time of Queen Victoria's coronation. Here he created a furor, and his services were demanded at upwards of seventy concerts. A tour of the provinces preceded his return to Vienna. Henceforth he enjoyed immense popularity, and was much honoured by Royalty. His second English tour, which occurred in 1849, marked the culminating point of his esteem in this country. Shortly after his return he was carried off by scarlet fever. He left three sons, who afterwards became famous musicians.

JOHANN STRAUSS the younger (born 1825, at Vienna; died 1899) rivalled his father's fame as a composer of dance-music, and became known as the 'Waltz King.' He composed the 'Blue Danube' Waltz ('An der schönen blauen Donau') and the operetta 'Die Fledermaus,' produced last month at His Majesty's Theatre. His father opposed his design to follow a musical career, which nevertheless was soon carried to fruition. At the age of nineteen he was performing his own compositions with his own small orchestra. A few years later he amalgamated his own and his deceased father's bands, and undertook a successful tour in Germany. For ten years he held a conductor's post in St. Petersburg. His career was as brilliant as that of his father, but less eventful. It was described fully, with a portrait of the composer, in the Musical Times for August, 1909. His creative style differed little from that of the elder Strauss. During the latter part of his life he devoted his energies to the composition of operettas, of which he left sixteen examples.

JOSEPH STRAUSS (born 1827, at Vienna; died 1870), the second son of Johann Strauss the elder, was a conductor and a prolific composer in the style of his father and brother.

EDUARD STRAUSS (born 1835, at Vienna) the youngest son of Johann Strauss the elder, is also a composer, but has achieved greater fame as a conductor. He has made frequent concert tours in Germany, and his visit to London in 1885 for the Inventions Exhibition is remembered.

RICHARD STRAUSS, the celebrated composer of 'Elektra,' is no relation to the family of waltz composers. He was born at Munich in 1864, and is still busy composing. His father was a horn-player, and fostered his child's precocious musical talent. The most effective part of a long and thorough musical education was received at the hands of Billow and Alexander Ritter. His fine abilities as a conductor were recognized in 1885, and secured him successive posts as Capellmeister, leading in 1889 to his appointment as Court Capellmeister at Munich. He has frequently made European concert tours, and has visited London on several occasions, notably at a 'Strauss Festival' in 1903. The relative positions of his best-known works can be seen from the following table:

1889.	Don Juan (Op. 20).
1890.	Tod und Verklärung (Op. 24).
1894.	Guntram (Opera) (Op. 25).
1895.	Till Eulenspiegel (Op. 28).
1896.	Also sprach Zarathustra (Op. 30).
1897.	Don Quixote (Op. 35).
1899.	Ein Heldenleben (Op. 40).
1901.	Feuersnot (Opera) (Op. 50).
	Symphonia Domestica (Op. 53).
1905.	Salome (Opera) (Op. 54).
1908.	Elektra (Opera) (Op. 58).

Except the operas, all of these are orchestral tone-poems. 'Don Juan,' 'Heldenleben' and 'Salome' are important as representing three important stages of advancement of style. An illustrated article upon his life and works appeared in the Musical Times for January, 1903.

ROYAL OPERA, COVENT GARDEN.

If the presence of novelties is the determining factor in the character of a season, then this year's record at the Royal Opera, Covent Garden, must be accounted uneventful. But as a matter of fact too much stress is laid on the importance of operatic novelties, and for the simple reason that the British as opera-goers have still much to learn. The business of the Grand Syndicate, it is clear, is to provide for a class of patrons who are very well acquainted with opera and its best exponents. Therefore their hand is free to put forward what they like, and they have taken full advantage of the privilege. The one novelty has been M. Raoul Laparra's 'La Habanera,' and it has been not only the single new work of the month but also of the whole season. Its production was promised last season, when the work would have been one year old; its postponement until July 18 made the period since its first hearing at the Opéra Comique, Paris, exactly that of two years and a-half. It is a remarkable work, but it would have created a greater impression had the management made it quite clear to the public that the composer is not yet five-and-twenty years of age. It is his first effort, and he is his own librettist. The summary of it is that it is the work of a remarkably clever boy. It is new in the aspect of fidelity of its expression, but not in its tonality. There are some passages that recall the early Verdi—not a bad school, provided the later Verdi be also studied—but the hearers are spared the tuneless temerity of the new Italian school or the Eastern eccentricities of the new French school. It is individual, and in ten years' time—provided he be not spoilt in the interval—M. Laparra should be able to write something that will attract and retain attention. The story is dreadfully gruesome. Two brothers, in old Castile, love the same girl, Pilar. Pedro has succeeded in winning her hand and is about to be united to her; Ramon, the brother, endeavours in vain to conquer his grief and jealousy, and in a fit of mad passion stabs Pedro. He is not charged with the crime—the 'époque indéterminée' in which the action takes place seems to account for the absence of any law on the subject of homicide—but his victim, in dying, to the measured strains of a habanera played outside, vows to haunt him and to appear to him in a year's time less one day. The year, less one day, passes, and Ramon's house is visited by three blind beggars. The guilty man sees four, and his conviction is strengthened when his visitors begin to play the habanera that accompanied the original crime. The last Act takes place in the burial ground where the murdered man lies in his unavenged grave. His murderer endeavours to confess his misdeed to Pilar, but she frustrates his intention by dying on her betrothed's tomb, and the conscience-stricken brother rushes out of the cemetery, demented, either to work out his moral salvation or to provide the material for another opera. The music is more healthy than the story, but it is largely ineffective by reason of the lack of experience of its designer. A strong sense of colour and of effect is shown, but the whole is much too immature to hold any permanent place. It was finely played. Madame Demellier, of the Paris Opéra Comique, made her first appearance in England as Pilar, and suggested that the other and more famous Franco-Iberian opera by Bizet would have been a better medium for the display of her undoubted gifts. M. Dalmorès was the lover who is slain, and M. Bourbon as his slayer gave a wonderfully dramatic delineation. M. Frigara conducted. The coldness of the reception was not altogether due to the wintry July evening on which the work was produced.

A SERIES OF REVIVALS.

The other operas mounted have all been familiar. Taken in their chronological order, M. Charpentier's delightful 'Louise' comes first in the month. The cast was nearly the same as last year, namely, with Madame Edvina as a very charming representative of the wilful work-girl Louise, and M. Dalmorès as the lover; but on this occasion, in the absence of M. Gilbert, Signor Marcoux appeared as the Father. He gave a finely-wrought study, although he was not entirely successful in reproducing the real French spirit of the part. The opera was received with a like amount of cordiality as on its production, and it seems probable that its wonderful reality, its picturesqueness, and its high musical value will constitute it as permanent an attraction in England as it is on the Continent. Another of last year's productions, Baron F. d'Erlanger's 'Tess,' a pretty and tuneful if not very English version of the Wessex classic, was revived, with Mlle. Destinn again in the name part; Signor Sammarco as d'Urberville, and Mr. Riccardo Martin as an Angel Clare of much merit. The annual performance of Meyerbeer's 'Gli Ugonotti' has been given, and the occasion may be regarded as noteworthy, since both Madame Tetrassini and Mlle. Destinn appeared in the cast; Signor Zerola was the Raoul, Mr. Edmund Burke the San Bris, Mr. Murray Davey an excellent Marcello, and Mlle. De Lima (a new-comer) a sprightly Urbano, but with the famous 'Caso non eguale' omitted. For the rest, there has been little but repetition; the plan has, however, proved profitable. It has introduced an excellent Mephistopheles for Gounod's 'Faust' in the shape of Mr. Edmund Burke, while Madame Kousnietzoff has reappeared as Marguerite. Miss Lalla Miranda has once more illustrated Australian vocal attainments by her assumption, at short notice, in place of Madame Melba, of Violetta in Verdi's perennial 'La Traviata.' In the penultimate week Puccini's 'Manon Lescaut' was added to the list, with Mlle. Destinn and Mr. Martin, and the season, which in spite of doubts and difficulties has been in every way successful, was brought to a close on July 30.

CHESTER HISTORICAL PAGEANT.

Conspicuous success attended the daily performances of the Chester Pageant, July 18 to 23. They visualised the scenes of long dead generations with a vividness of historical interest and a semblance of living reality remarkable in conception and splendid in spectacle. To Mr. George P. Hawtrey, the pageant-master, is due the introduction of the spoken word and dramatic element which heightened the spectacular interest of the various tableaux, and to Dr. Joseph C. Bridge the appropriate choice of music of English flavour, in keeping with the various eras represented. This happy choice was especially shown in the delightful scenes of old English revelry of the Tudor and Stuart periods. Attention was directed last month to the Pageant music-book published by Messrs. Novello, which contains in addition to lilted choral arrangements of old English melodies, examples of Dr. Bridge's facility as a composer, notably in his chorus of monks, 'Urbs Syon aurea,' 'The hobby-horse' song, and the stately 'Ode to Chester.' Detailed accounts of the historical accuracy of the costumes and the fine spectacular effects in their picturesque environment, having already appeared elsewhere, it remains merely to chronicle the musical side of the Pageant.

After the opening procession, in which the fine band of the Royal Marines (Portsmouth Division) was followed by the 250 members of the chorus, the National Anthem was sung under the direction of Dr. J. C. Bridge. No subsequent episode provided a prettier spectacle than the Introduction, devised and written by Mr. Hawtrey. The goddess of the Dee, accompanied by countless little elves and fairies who appeared from all quarters of the distant woodland, furnished a feast of undulating colour, intended to represent the wavelets of the river, which flows too far away to be brought actually into the pageant. Meanwhile the chorus sang 'An Invocation to Deva,' a choral adaptation of the valse 'Sabrina,' by Mr. Lewis Hann, of Cheltenham. It should be mentioned that the charm and effect of the choral music lay in its being chiefly unaccompanied, and that the various choruses were heard before each episode, while the arena was unoccupied; a plan which allowed exclusive attention to be paid to the expressive singing. The first episode dealt with the Roman occupation and with Agricola the Governor of Britain in A.D. 78. Flemming's music to 'Integer vixit' was here suitably introduced. Henry Lawes's 'Invocation to Sabrina,' as arranged by Sir Frederick Bridge, was the prelude to the second episode, 'King Edgar receiving the homage of the eight tributary kings,' A.D. 973, and incidentally were played the lively strains of William Lawes's 'Almain,' 'Sarabande' and 'jigg.' Henry Smart's 'Waken, lords and ladies gay' was sung before episode three, 'The Founding of the Abbey of St. Werburgh, A.D. 1093,' and as a recessional Dr. Bridge's melodious 'Founders' Hymn.' Episode four depicted 'Archbishop Baldwin's visit to Chester to preach the third Crusade,' a highly-interesting scene; the choral music included Dr. Bridge's 'Chorus of Monks' and Sullivan's 'O gladsome Light.' The fifth episode illustrating Prince Edward and Princess Eleanor visiting Chester, A.D. 1256, was preceded by Rachmaninoff's Prelude, conducted by Lieut. G. P. Miller, M.V.O., and as a recessional, Edward German's 'Morris dance' and Grieg's prelude to 'Sigurd Jorsalfar' were played. The sixth episode, 'Richard II. is brought a prisoner to Chester, A.D. 1399,' was chorally introduced by Dr. Bridge's arrangement of the merry old ballad, 'The Miller of the Dee,' and another old song, 'The Cheshire Cheese,' was the prelude to episode seven, which was firstly devoted to the 'Visit of King James I.,' A.D. 1617, and secondly to the Midsummer Revels, circa 1620. In this delightful scene the music had a close connection with the episode, and local colour was given instrumentally by the 'Waits' tunes, quaint and lively old dance measures which used to be played on the 'Recorders' or flutes in different sizes, of which Chester possesses one of the only two complete sets now extant. The Chester 'Recorders' were borne in the procession. The choral examples of old English ballad music, which made one visitor's eyes brighter while saying 'I love this music,' included Dr. Bridge's spirited arrangements of 'Come, lasses and lads,' and 'Joan to the maypole,' in which the accompanying drum-taps marked the rhythm. Very mirth-provoking was the Battle of the

Mr. W. W. Starmer, whose recent lectures at the Royal Institution on bells, carillons and chimes caused great interest, has been appointed an adjudicator at the International competition of carillonneurs which is to take place at Malines on August 21 and 22 (see p. 506). Mr. Starmer is the first English musician to be elected to this office.

Hobby-horses, for which Dr. Bridge had written a capital song for the Chester Guilds' boys. A fine madrigal, 'Sister, awake!' composed by Thomas Bateson, organist of Chester Cathedral in 1602, preluded episode eight, descriptive of the Siege of Chester and visit of Charles I., A.D. 1645. For the Finale, Dr. Bridge had written an 'Ode to Chester,' in which the pen of the ready writer was employed in martial strains set to words by the late Rev. S. F. Macdonald, of Matthew Henry's Chapel, Chester. Such is the barest outline of the musical features of this great and notable Pageant, in the preparation and the performance of which civic pride had been thoroughly enlisted and employed. The episodes had been written by local writers, and all classes of society were fully represented in the multitude of performers, both horse and foot, who had been so well rehearsed and so capably directed.

THE QUEEN'S HALL PROMENADE CONCERTS.

On Saturday, August 13, the sixteenth series of Promenade Concerts organized by Mr. Robert Newman will open at Queen's Hall, and for ten weeks a concert will be given on every week-day evening. Mr. Henry J. Wood will conduct the entire series. The particulars issued indicate that a gratifying amount of attention will be given to the claims of British executants and composers. Nearly the entire list of artists is composed of British names, some thirty of which will appear in the programmes for the first time.

The new works that are to be performed are in all but a few cases by British composers. They include the following:

Two Eastern Dances for Orchestra ..	Easthope Martin
Suite for Strings	Arthur Foote
Fantaisie Concertante for Viola and Orchestra ..	J. Rogister
Fantasia on English Folk-Song ..	Vaughan Williams
Two Night-Pieces for Orchestra ..	H. V. Jervis-Reed
New Suite—'The Magic Mirror' ..	William Y. Hursthouse
New Festival Overture	Walford Davies
Four Dances from 'The Blue Bird' ..	Norman O'Neill
'The Vicar of Bray'—Variations for String Orchestra (Op. 35)	Ernest Austin
Serenade for Small Orchestra	Percy Pitt

Works by Messrs. Arnold Bax, Ernest Bryson and J. W. G. Hathaway, the names of which are not yet given, will also be performed.

The older works that will be added to the repertoire include the 'Hulda' ballet music by César Franck, Macdowell's Pianoforte concerto in D minor (Op. 23), and Ebenezer Prout's Concerto in E minor for organ and orchestra (Op. 5).

The leader of the orchestra will again be Mr. Arthur Catterall, and Mr. F. B. Kiddle will be the organist and accompanist.

ROYAL COLLEGE OF MUSIC.

A 'Memorial Concert for the Founder of the College' was given by the choir and orchestra on June 29, under the direction of Sir Charles Stanford. The most notable in a programme of impressive and solemn works, was Bach's 'Trauer-Ode,' written for the funeral of Queen Christina of Poland in 1727. The work has suffered unjust neglect from which this performance may help to rescue it. An edition of the Ode will shortly be published by Messrs. Novello & Co. The other works were Brahms's Rhapsody for contralto and male-chorus, expressively sung by Miss Florence Taylor, Beethoven's 'Eroica' symphony and Brahms's 'Song of destiny.'

On July 14 a chamber concert was given. The chief concerted works performed were Smetana's String quartet in E minor and Beethoven's D major Pianoforte trio (Op. 70, No. 1).

A highly-interesting orchestral concert was given on July 22. The programme opened with Mr. J. D. Davis's beautiful and musically Symphonic poem 'The maid of Astolat,' which was performed sympathetically and with executive ease by the students, under the direction of Sir Charles Stanford. Brahms's Concerto for violin and violoncello in A minor (Op. 102), was played by two scholars, Mr. Philip Levine and Mr. Cedric Sharpe, and vocal solos were given by Miss Catherine Ryan and Mr. David Ellis. The most noteworthy feature of the concert came at the end in the shape of Sir Alexander Mackenzie's three orchestral preludes to 'Manfred,' which the composer himself conducted. The three preludes are musical illustrations to three quotations from 'Manfred,' so chosen as to provide well-contrasted movements. The first, 'Astarte,' has the greatest dignity; the second is a pastoral whose picturesqueness is heightened by the employment of cow-bells; the third, inspired by the words 'I do defy—deny—spurn back and scorn ye,' and entitled 'The flight of the spirits,' is a vivid piece of musical description. The whole cycle is finely conceived and scored with great effect. Sir Alexander Mackenzie and his work were well received by a large audience.

The twenty-seventh annual general meeting was held on July 15, H. R. H. Prince Christian of Schleswig Holstein in the chair. The secretary, Mr. Charles Morley, announced that The King had graciously consented to become Patron of the College, and had been pleased to appoint Prince Christian as president. The report of the Council referred to the peculiar loss sustained by the College in the death of King Edward, to whose labours the Institution owed its existence and whose constant sympathy and support as Patron were invaluable. Prince Christian moved, and Mr. Lionel Benson seconded, the adoption of the report.

The following presentations were made by the chairman: Challen gold medal for pianoforte-playing to Joseph A. Taffs (scholar); gold medal for the most generally deserving pupil to Evelyn M. Pickup (exhibitioner); John Hopkinson gold and silver medals for pianoforte-playing to Miss Grace A. Humphery and Miss De Rozario (both in absence).

A resolution expressing thanks to Prince Christian was moved by Mr. E. H. Pember, seconded by Mr. S. Ernest Palmer, and carried by acclamation.

TONIC SOL-FA ASSOCIATION.

The fifty-third choral festival of this Association was held at the Crystal Palace on June 25. The junior choir of 5,000 voices carried out their programme with an excellence of tone-production and rhythmic feeling that have seldom been surpassed by similar bodies of juvenile singers. They were ably and sympathetically conducted by Mr. S. Filmer Rook; Mr. C. H. Rowcliffe was the organist.

The singing of the adult choir of 1,500 voices was distinguished by its smoothness and refinement. Although a collection of units, the choir sang with the precision of a permanent organization and provided a practical demonstration of Dr. Borland's controlling power and personal influence. The capabilities of the choir were fully explored by the following programme:

O praise the Lord with one consent	Handel
How sweet the moonlight sleeps	Leslie
Merrily wake music's measure	Barnett
The three fishers	G. A. Macfarren
There be none of beauty's daughters	Walthew
Good night, beloved	Pinsuti
Sweete flowers, ye were too faire	Walmisley
When Israel out of Egypt came (Psalm 114) ..	Mendelssohn

The expression thrown into the singing of the part-songs was always interesting, and the fine interpretation of the Mendelssohn Psalm was a notable achievement. A large orchestra played separate items effectively and, with assistance at the organ, supplied accompaniments.

NONCONFORMIST CHOIR UNION.

The twenty-second annual festival of this organization, held at the Crystal Palace on July 2, attracted an attendance of unusual magnitude. The concert given by the combined choirs, numbering in all over 4,000 voices, proceeded smoothly and successfully under the careful and able guidance of Mr. Frank Idle. Mr. John E. West's Te Deum in G was one of many works interpreted with noteworthy effect; another was 'Unfold, ye portals everlasting,' from Gounod's 'Redemption.' In Spohr's 'As pants the hart,' the solo part was in the hands of Miss Ada Forrest. Other sacred works in the programme were Tchaikovsky's 'Hymn to the Trinity,' Wesley's anthem 'Wash me thoroughly,' and Sullivan's 'O gladsome Light.' The secular portion consisted of Cowen's 'Come to me, gentle sleep' and 'Bring branches from forest,' Lee Williams's 'The song of the pedlar,' Elgar's 'O happy eyes,' and Eaton Fanning's 'We love our island story.'

Songs were given by Miss Forrest and Mr. Alexander Tucker. An orchestra took part, and Mr. J. A. Neale assisted at the organ. The competitive part of the day's proceedings is dealt with in the Competition Festival Record.

THE NATIONAL UNION OF SCHOOL ORCHESTRAS.

The festival concerts of this organization were held on July 16 at the Crystal Palace. It is safe to say that never before has there been assembled under one roof such an extraordinary number of violinists. The 'intermediate' orchestra of 2,500 and the 'advanced' orchestra of 2,000 gave separate concerts of well-chosen music, and Mr. Allen Gill, who is used to directing operations on a large scale, secured performances of striking effectiveness and efficiency in spite of the arrangements that permitted only one rehearsal. An interesting event was the playing of Schumann's 'Slumber song' by the five winners of the Guildhall School of Music Scholarships, founded by the Union. The two challenge shields for school orchestras were awarded to Croyland Road Council School, Edmonton (intermediate) and Westbury Girls' School, Barking (advanced). At the two concerts the Walthamstow Silver Prize Band and Mr. T. Mee Pattison at the organ supplied harmony to the melody of the violinists. The vocalists were Miss Alice Motterway and Mr. Samuel Masters.

'THE DREAM OF GERONTIUS.'

PERFORMANCE AT ARUNDEL CASTLE.
(FROM OUR SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT.)

A powerful stimulus to music in Sussex was provided by the performance of Sir Edward Elgar's 'The Dream of Gerontius,' which was given by the invitation of the Duke of Norfolk at Arundel Castle on July 14. The Sheffield Choral Union was engaged as the choir; the orchestra was that of the Queen's Hall; the principals were Mr. Gervase Elwes, Mr. Herbert Heyner and Miss Clare Hamilton, and the conductor was Mr. Henry J. Wood. It is probable that the event constituted a record in the musical annals of Sussex, for though of late years there have been some striking proofs of the increasing interest in music, of which the most notable is the Municipal Festival at Brighton, nothing of quite so perfect a character has been done in this part of England before. The educative value of the undertaking is great, for with the aid of the Sheffield Choral Union, whose technique Dr. Henry Coward has brought to such a high pitch, and the Queen's Hall Orchestra, a performance of notable finish was secured. The important part of 'Gerontius' was in the hands of one of its best exponents, and a marked impression was made by Mr. Herbert Heyner with the baritone music.

The particular object of the performance was the augmentation of the finances of the Arundel Hospital and the Littlehampton Hospital Building Fund. To what extent these deserving Institutions are benefited has not yet been made public, but the attendance was eminently satisfactory. The great Hall of the castle, one of the newer portions of this fine old landmark, was utilised as the concert room. It is theoretically complete, for there is an excellent organ in the gallery, but it was not possible to make use of it on this occasion, owing to the difference of its pitch from that of the orchestra. The hall, which holds between 400 and 500 people, was well filled. The audience came from all parts of the county, as was made clear by the number of motor cars that stood ranged against the outer walls of the castle like mighty engines of war, though of different import from those in use in the past.

In spite of the novelty of the conditions under which the performance was given, it reached a very high level. The choir left Sheffield the previous evening, and stayed the night in London for rest and rehearsal, proceeding the next morning to Arundel. A short rehearsal in the morning served the double purpose of making certain one or two points and of testing the acoustic properties of the hall, for it is to be noted with interest that this was the first occasion on which the castle had been used for musical performances. It is hoped that it will not be the last. The hall not only fulfils its purpose well, but is also situated at a part of the county where much might be done to foster the love of music.

The introduction of so notable a work as Sir Edward Elgar's setting of Cardinal Newman's poem was certainly a happy beginning. It was put forward in such a way as to produce the most favourable impression of its great and distinctive qualities, and the rapt attention with which the interpretation was listened to, and the interest shown in the occasion, give rise to the most sanguine hopes concerning this new and gratifying concern for the art shown by the Duke and Duchess of Norfolk. Details of the performance are superfluous. The choir sang magnificently. Its special methods, its fine incisiveness, pure tone, and unflinching tunefulness, never showed to better advantage. Its work was remarkable for the beauty of tone heard in the semi-choruses, the volume of sound in the exalted 'Proficiscere, anima Christiana,' and the conviction of the inspired final number which brings to an end one of the greatest works in British musical literature. Mr. Gervase Elwes sang with full meaning, although suffering some personal discomfort as the result of a blow in the mouth from a cricket ball, and, as already indicated, Mr. Herbert Heyner established his reputation by his singing of the baritone music. Miss Clare Hamilton, who is a new recruit to the ranks of oratorio singers, gave the music of the 'Angel' with notable accuracy, and with all the feeling it demands. Her singing was notable for its calm restraint, which while it was appropriate to the character, also invested her reading with an exceptional quality. Mr. Henry J. Wood's firm conducting was a feature of the interpretation, and raised it to a very high level. The orchestral portions were given their full meaning, and the performance, like the generous spirit that provided it, was in every way worthy of note and commendation.

London Concerts.

CHAMBER MUSIC.

The 'New Quartet,' whose members are Mr. A. E. Sammons, Mr. Thomas W. Petre, Mr. H. Waldo Warner and Mr. C. Warwick-Evans, made their first appearance early in the year and gave their second concert at Bechstein Hall on June 28. The supposition that the length of the interval was occasioned by their zeal for thorough rehearsal, was borne out by the admirable qualities of their playing. Their performance of Debussy's G minor Quartet was one of outstanding excellence. Beethoven's first 'Rasoumofsky' quartet was interpreted with an attractive infusion of romance, and a sympathetic reading of Mr. Balfour Gardiner's Quartet in one movement completed the programme.

Dr. Walford Davies's 'Peter Pan' quartet, originally produced by the Walenn Quartet, was given a welcome repetition on July 7 at their concert in Æolian Hall. The music is as peculiarly British as Mr. Barrie's humour, and reproduces its imaginative genius with such completeness and aptness as to suggest an obvious course to those who next produce the play. The Quartet played Dr. Davies's work, and quartets by Haydn and Dvorák, with excellent effect. Songs were provided by Miss Jean Waterston.

PIANOFORTE RECITALS.

At Mr. Percy Grainger's recital, which took place at Æolian Hall on June 22, neither the programme nor the playing were of the common order of things. Tchaikovsky's unfamiliar and interesting Sonata in G minor (Op. 37) brought out the vitality of the pianist's style and his power of controlling without weakening a climax. Some examples of old Dutch music arranged by Julius Röntgen were introduced. Mr. Grainger's creative gifts were effectively exhibited in a fantasia on a 'Slow dance' by Sir Charles Stanford, and an arrangement for String quartet of two Irish reels. The latter work was played by the Langley-Mukle Quartet.

Mr. Vernon Warner promises to supplement his now finished career as a prodigy with a longer and more useful career as an artist of the pianoforte. The highest hopes were justified by his performance of César Franck's 'Variations symphoniques' and Tchaikovsky's B minor Concerto at Queen's Hall on June 23, when he was assisted by the Queen's Hall Orchestra, under Mr. Henry J. Wood.

Congratulations are due to Miss Jean Nesbitt, a new pianist from Canada, upon the well-deserved success of her first recital in England, which took place at Bechstein Hall on June 27.

The brilliant pianist, M. Alfred Cortot, made a welcome appearance at Æolian Hall on June 29, and showed in Chopin's four Ballades and Schumann's Carnival (Op. 9) how much poetry he has at his command.

Herr Backhaus gave his second Chopin recital at Queen's Hall on July 2. The chief features of the programme were the B minor Sonata and the Etudes, of which he gave a technically faultless performance. Herr Backhaus also played the rarely-heard but beautiful Prelude in C sharp minor (Op. 45), and several Mazurkas, the latter in a rather Teutonic fashion.

Mr. Edward Goll, who gave a pianoforte recital at Bechstein Hall on July 4, showed a distinct advance in his art. His programme covered a wide range, and served to indicate the breadth of his sympathies.

The junior students of Mr. Tobias Matthay's Pianoforte School gave a recital at Bechstein Hall on July 6, and Mr. Matthay's artist-students and scholars at the Royal Academy of Music were heard at the same Hall on July 14. Of the latter, Master Vivian Langrish and Miss Evie Dawkin deserve to be specially mentioned.

Several young pianists, trained by Mr. Carl Weber, made a successful appearance at Bechstein Hall on July 12, the most notable performances being those of Miss Ella Hackworth in César Franck's Prelude, chorale, and fugue, and Miss Maude Dixon with Max Darewski in Saint-Saëns's Variations for two pianofortes on a theme by Beethoven.

VOCAL RECITALS.

An interesting recital was given by Herr Reinhold von Warlich at 54, Mount Street, the residence of Lord Plymouth, on June 21. The vocalist included von Fielitz's 'Eiland' song-cycle and some Elizabethan love-songs by Morley, Tobias Hume and Robert Jones in his programme, which he carried out with his usual skill and expressive feeling.

Mr. Theodore Byard, whose illness has for some time kept him from the concert-platform, gave a recital at Bechstein Hall on June 23 and again won complete favour. His programme was distinguished by the introduction of interesting novelties by foreign composers and due consideration given to English music. 'Séparation,' by the brothers Hillemecher; 'Le Semeur,' by Alexis de Castillon; and songs by Messrs. Cyril Scott, Roger Quilter and Amherst Webber were well interpreted and well received.

An unconventional programme, interesting chiefly on historical grounds, was compiled by Miss Maggie Teyte for her recital at Æolian Hall on June 24. It consisted of a number of operatic excerpts by 18th century composers, chosen from the répertoire of Madame Dugazon. On the same day Madame Noldi gave a recital with a varied programme at Æolian Hall. Recitals were given by Miss Gertrude Lonsdale at Bechstein Hall on June 27, and by Miss Irene St. Clair at Æolian Hall on June 28.

Miss Eva Katharina Lissmann gave further evidence of her exceptional ability as a lieder singer at Bechstein Hall on June 29; she was assisted on this occasion by Mr. Hans Lissmann, himself a vocalist of ability.

The commendable endeavours of Miss Leila Duart, who made her first appearance on June 30 at Bechstein Hall, produced artistic results and were well received. 'Rafael,' a Danish tenor who made his first appearance in England at Bechstein Hall on July 1, showed considerable ability, but scarcely enough to justify him in dispensing with initials and other customary complements to a surname.

Recitals were given by Madame Blanche Marchesi at Leighton House on July 7 and 14. On both occasions she was assisted by Mr. George Copeland, an admirable player of Debussy's pianoforte pieces.

Mr. Robert Chignell carried out an exacting programme to universal satisfaction at Æolian Hall on July 12. He sang Brahms's four 'Serious songs' with deep expression. Some songs by that clever musician, Miss Katherine Ruth Heyman, were given their first performance and were well received.

OTHER RECITALS AND CONCERTS.

Few reciters now before the public rival the many-sided ability and personal excellences of Mrs. Tobias Matthay, and the recital which she gave at Æolian Hall on June 23 was in the highest degree enjoyable. Her programme ranged from the tragic to the humorous, with a tendency to favour the latter, and many of the items gained in interest from the introductory remarks made by the reciter.

A new Violin and Pianoforte sonata by Miss Bertha Tressler was played by Madame Harriet Solly and Miss Ada Thomas at the latter's recital given on June 23 at Steinway Hall. The work was commendable both for its ideas and for the skill with which the composer has treated them.

Signor Livio Boni created an excellent impression in giving his first violoncello recital in England at Bechstein Hall on June 23. At the same Hall, on the following day, Miss Helen Gough, a young and promising violinist, made her first appearance with great success. Miss Gladys Clark also made her first appearance as a violinist on June 24 at Queen's Hall, when she gave artistic interpretations of Concertos in A major by Mozart and A minor by Vieuxtemps, assisted by the New Symphony Orchestra under Mr. Landon Ronald.

A 'Dream of Beethoven' was the most notable of the compositions of Mr. John Francis Barnett brought forward by his sister, Miss Emma Barnett (pianist), at Broadwood's on June 23.

Madame Yvette Guilbert's characteristic methods of singing English as well as French songs were exhibited at Bechstein Hall on June 24 and 29, as usual to the delight of large audiences. Her juvenile counterpart, Mona Gondré, assisted on both occasions.

The persistent faultlessness of Mischa Elman's violin playing is so often exhibited to London audiences, and has been so often commented upon that it is sufficient to place on record his recital given at Queen's Hall on June 25, when he played the D minor Concerto of Max Bruch.

Some works by M. Emmanuel Moor, a composer of 'modernistic' proclivities, were submitted at Æolian Hall on June 27, with Madame Marie Leroy (vocalist) and Madame Marie de Jaroslawska (pianist) as skilled and sympathetic exponents.

A violin recital, given by Miss Isoline Harvey at Bechstein Hall on June 28, displayed the advantages of a recent course of study with Sevcik.

It is seldom that a lady gives an organ recital at Queen's Hall, and much interest was shown in Miss Adelaide Parker's venture on June 30. As was proper in a pupil of Sir Walter Parratt and Max Reger, Miss Parker showed considerable skill and insight into artistic effect. Her programme included Reger's B.A.C.H. fantasia. Miss Winifred Ponder contributed vocal numbers.

Three works by English composers received their first performance at the concert given by Madame Clara Butt at Queen's Hall on June 30. Miss Annie D. Steele's song-cycle 'Among the lilies,' the words of which are extracted from the Canticle of Canticles, was sung by the concert-giver with accompaniment supplied by the Queen's Hall Orchestra, under Mr. Wood. The composer has gone far towards succeeding in her ambitious design to reproduce in her music the depth of feeling and aloofness of the words. The other novelties were a Pianoforte concerto composed and performed by Mr. Frank Merrick, and a set of 'Old English Dances' by Mr. Roger Quilter; both had lucidity, melodiousness and artistic phraseology in their favour, and earned ready appreciation.

A concert was given at Æolian Hall on June 30 by the excellent Audrey Chapman Orchestra, with the design of providing for the expenses of the organization. Mr. René Ortmans conducted his efficient body of lady instrumentalists in an exacting programme, to the demands of which they responded in masterly fashion. The soloists were Miss Edith Miller and Mr. Gervase Elwes.

Señor Casals gave an extra concert, in company with Mr. Tovey, at Æolian Hall on July 1, and the consummate skill and expressive nature of his violoncello playing again provoked admiration.

Mlle. Marguerite Scialtel gave recitations with extreme skill and attractive individual methods at Bechstein Hall on July 4, assisted by Mr. Morgan Kingston (vocalist) and Dr. Serge Barjansky (violoncello).

The three Misses Eissler, pianist, violinist, and harpist, gave an interesting recital at Leighton House on July 5.

Mr. Francis Tovey's fondness for the flute impelled him to write a sonata for that instrument and the pianoforte, which was performed with unequivocal success at Steinway Hall, on July 5, by Mr. R. Murchie and Miss Hirschfeld. The work showed skill, both in invention and design, and one need not cavil at Mr. Tovey's disposition to employ the resources of expression opened in recent years by composers other than English, for the total effect lost nothing thereby.

A first appearance was made by Mlle. Pauline de Schonberg as a reciter at Steinway Hall on July 7.

Mr. Henry Holden Huss and his wife, who are pianist and vocalist respectively, and reside in New York, made their first appearance in London at Steinway Hall on July 8. Some compositions by Mr. Huss were included in the programme.

Mr. Wilfred J. Bendall's setting of 'The lady of Shalott,' for ladies' voices, was sung at a concert given by Mr. Atherton Furlong at Bechstein Hall on July 10. The composer accompanied. Solos were given by vocalists trained by the concert-giver.

On July 12, Miss Selma Sacke (violinist) and Miss Vera Wise (pianist), two clever young artists from South Africa, gave a recital at Steinway Hall and earned admiration for the refined beauty of their combined playing. Their programme included an MS. Sonata by Mr. J. D. Davis, upon which the composer has evidently expended much care in the endeavour to secure legitimate effect. He gives expression to his modernism without recourse to complexity and without sacrifice of design. The themes have character and refinement.

A concert by senior students of the London Academy of Music took place at the Hampstead Conservatoire on July 14, when a well-chosen selection of vocal and instrumental solos were rendered by the students in a manner which reflected credit on the training received at this institution.

A concert was given at Bechstein Hall on July 15 by three juvenile artists named Cherniavski. Jan is a pianist, Leo a violinist, and Mischel a violoncellist. They were heard together in a spirited performance of Arensky's D minor Trio, and each contributed a solo to the programme.

Signor Mario Lren Lorenzi showed more than ordinary skill as a harpist in giving his recital at Broadwood's Rooms on July 16. Though still early in his 'teens, he is thoroughly versed in all the possibilities of his instrument, and plays in an individual and effective manner that excites an interest not usually associated with harp-playing.

The high musical traditions of Oundle School, to which we drew attention by an article in our issue of December last, were preserved in the Midsummer concert given on June 25. The most notable items in a programme of great length were movements from Schumann's 'Faschingsschwank' and Beethoven's Sonata, Op. 27 (No. 2), for pianoforte, Brahms's Sonata, Op. 38, for violoncello and pianoforte, Dvorák's Bagatellen for pianoforte quartet, Purcell's chorus, 'In these delightful, pleasant groves,' Pearsall's 'Let us all go a-maying,' and Stanford's Elizabethan pastoral 'Phœbe.' Mr. C. M. Spurling organized the concert and conducted the choir and orchestra. The latter contributed Dvorák's 'Slavonic dance' No. 4, and Johann Strauss's 'Kaiser Waltz.'

MUSIC IN VIENNA.

Vienna, July 15.

The opera vacation commenced on June 22, shortly after the termination of the Italian opera season. On June 19 we were treated to a sensational performance of Richard Strauss's opera 'Elektra,' conducted by the composer. The title-part and the part of Klytemnestra were presented in the most favourable light by Miss Edyth Walker and Madame Bahr-Mildenburg. The Vienna public, always amiably disposed towards famous visitors, accorded Herr Strauss a most enthusiastic reception. The work itself did not on this occasion alter any previous impression, and the personal influence of the composer in no way tended towards toning down the nerve-shocking brutality of the music.

In Opera circles the air is full of rumours with regard to the management, a change in which is expected during the holidays. Director von Weingartner intends to resign, chiefly for private reasons. Conjecture is rife as to his probable successor, though nothing definite is yet known.

On June 26 another Italian opera company commenced with Puccini's 'La Bohème' a series of performances in the Carltheater, which is usually devoted to operettas and melodramas. The list of principals included Messadmes Giachetti, Almansi, Padovani, and Alvarez (the last-named a brilliant Carmen), and Messrs. Carasa, Folio, Castoldi, de Marco, Modesti and Corrado. Maestro Bonazzi proved a highly efficient conductor. In spite of considerable energy, the company failed to obtain sufficient public support, and on July 3 had to suspend its productions.

RICHARD VON PERGER.

MUSIC IN MANCHESTER AND DISTRICT.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

Manchester musical life has been focussed during the past month in the annual public examinations—three in number—of the Royal Manchester College of Music, at which compositions by students have been a more prominent feature than in previous years. The most conspicuous examples were provided by two pupils in composition of Dr. Walter Carroll's, the first of which was a Trio for violin, violoncello and pianoforte by Mr. Harry Baynton-Power (a native of Chorley), who may be regarded as a product of the competitive festival movement in Lancashire. Mr. Power is a pianist of considerable fluency, and his composition, whilst showing greater intimacy with the pianistic idiom than with that of stringed instruments, is refreshingly free from the smugness and the triteness often to be noted in early works: there is individuality, but it is not allowed to run riot. Miss Alice Dill showed genuine and individual feeling in three partsongs of her composition; and even case-hardened professional fiddlers were stirred to the depths by the remarkable playing of Dr. Brodsky's pupil, Miss Lena Kontorovich: such an outpouring of the emotionalism of the Slav is rarely encountered in this country.

The third annual report of the Royal Manchester College of Music Club, whose president is Mrs. Adolph Brodsky, reveals a membership of ninety-nine old students. Nine meetings (of a private nature) have been held in the past twelve months, and the report dwells with pride on the honour done to the Club by the visit of Madame Grieg last October, making that meeting one of historic interest in the annals of the Club. The programme of music performed at the annual meeting on July 14 included three Grieg songs by Mrs. Shaw (Miss Norah Meredith), six of the eight 'Zigeunerlieder' of Brahms (Op. 103), sung by Miss Lillie Wormald, and Brahms's Sonata in A major for violin and pianoforte, played by the Misses Crawshaw and Jones; Messrs. R. J. Forbes and A. Worsley accompanied the singers. Without in any way detracting from the work of these ladies, there can be no doubt that the chief interest of the evening lay in a first performance from MS. by Messrs. Edward Isaacs and Arthur Catterall, of the former gentleman's new Sonata in A major. The work met with a hearty reception from the composer's companions of his student-days, and it was quite evident that their enjoyment was genuine. The natural anxieties attendant upon such an initial performance of so intricate a work did not interfere with the composer's playing of the pianoforte part, and in Mr. Arthur Catterall he had not only a fine player but one imbued with that instinctive and responsive sympathy without which the playing of chamber music is nothing worth. It may be hoped that the wider Manchester public may enjoy an opportunity during the coming winter of hearing Mr. Isaac's new Sonata.

Foreign Notes.

BASLE.

The Basler Gesangverein (conductor, Herr Hermann Suter), recently gave two summer concerts at which only compositions by Beethoven were performed. The programmes included the 'Elegischer Gesang,' the choral work 'Meeresstille und glückliche Fahrt,' the Missa solennis and the ninth Symphony.

BERLIN.

Under the management of Herr Hermann Gura, a series of operatic performances has again been given this summer at the Neues Königliches Operntheater. Wagner's 'Lohengrin,' 'Die Meistersinger' and 'Der Ring des Nibelungen' have formed the most important part of the repertoire, which also included Zöllner's 'Ueberfall.' Some of the best singers of the contemporary German stage, among them Frau Otilie Metzger and Messrs. Feinhals and Van Rooy, were in the company.

COLOGNE.

A few days before the end of the season, Hugo Wolff's four-act opera, 'Der Corregidor,' was given for the first time at the Opera House. The work has many beauties, but suffers from a weak libretto and the composer's lack of dramatic sense. Another rather belated 'novelty,' viz., Gluck's little Schäferspiel, 'Die Maientkönigin,' proved very pleasing. On June 18, 19 and 20, the eighty-sixth Lower Rhine Musical Festival took place in the Opera House. At the first concert excellent performances of Beethoven's 'Missa solennis' and C minor Symphony were given. Bach's Magnificat, the overture to 'Genoveva,' and the Pianoforte concerto by Schumann (soloist, Herr Wilhelm Backhaus), Brahms's second Symphony in D major, the 'Schicksalslied,' and four of his beautiful vocal quartets formed the programme of the second concert. At the third concert a novelty, a 'Hochzeitlied' for chorus and orchestra, by Max Schillings, was produced. The work is interesting, both chorally and orchestrally, and was favourably received. At the same concert Herr Fritz Kreisler had his usual success with Mendelssohn's Violin concerto, and solos by Dittersdorf, Pugnani and Tartini. The proceedings terminated with a fine performance of Bruckner's Te Deum for soli, chorus and orchestra. Herr Fritz Steinbach was the conductor of the festival, and both the orchestra (numbering 139) and the Gürzenich choir greatly distinguished themselves.

ESSEN.

Many interesting works have been heard at the Symphony Concerts of the Municipal Orchestra (conductor, Professor Witte). Mozart was represented by his Concerto for viola (originally written for bassoon) and the rarely-performed Serenade for thirteen wind instruments. Of more modern compositions, Nodé's symphonic Variations proved very attractive, whereas Rubinstein's 'Ocean' symphony, in spite of many beauties (particularly in the first movement), seemed rather passé.—Under the conductorship of Kgl. Musikdirector Beckmann, the Evangelischer Kirchenchor gave a good performance of Handel's oratorio 'Judas Maccabæus.'

HALLE.

The Robert Franz Singakademie (conductor, Professor O. Reubke) recently gave a summer concert at which J. S. Bach's secular cantata, 'Mer hahn en neue Oberkeet' was performed for the first time in Halle. The programme also contained Schubert's 'Mirjams Siegesgesang,' and his songs for female chorus with accompaniment of harp and two horns.

MANNHEIM.

Towards the end of the season the Court Theatre produced a new one-act comic opera, 'Die Granate,' by Alfred Wernicke (solo flautist in the Opera Orchestra). The composer (who adapted the libretto from a novel by Victorien Sardou) and Hofkapellmeister Albert Coates, who secured an excellent performance of the new work, were much fêted. On the same occasion, Wolf-Ferrari's Intermzzo 'Susannens Geheimnis' was performed with considerable success for the first time. Weber's opera, 'Die drei Pintos,' was also recently given for the first time, Herr Gustav Mahler's excellent edition being used.

MUNICH.

The interesting Richard Strauss festival took place from June 23—28. All departments of the composer's activity were represented. The week was commenced with a fine performance, in the Prinzregenten Theater, of the opera 'Feuersnot,' under the composer's own inspiring direction. On the same occasion, Herr Felix Mottl secured an excellent rendering of the symphonic poem 'Ein Heldenleben.' On the following day Dr. Strauss himself conducted his opera 'Salome,' with Miss Edyth Walker in the title-part; subsequently 'Elektra' was impressively performed, under the baton of Felix Mottl, with Frau Preuse-Matzenauer and Fräulein Fassbender as Klytemnestra and Elektra. Three orchestral concerts were given, at which the famous Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra, conducted by Dr. Strauss, gave wonderful performances of a number of the composer's great orchestral works, including the symphonic phantasy 'Aus Italien,' the symphonic poems 'Don Quixote' (in which the solo violoncello was most exquisitely played by Herr Friedrich Buxbaum), 'Tod und Verklärung,' and the 'Symphonia domestica.' Herr Backhaus achieved great success with his playing of the 'Burleske' for pianoforte and orchestra, and Herr Fritz Feinhals sang the 'Hymnus' and 'Pilgers Morgenlied' and other songs with orchestral accompaniment. Two morning concerts were devoted to Strauss's chamber music. The programmes contained the Serenade for wind instruments, the Pianoforte quartet in C minor, the Sonata for pianoforte and violin in E flat, and the Violoncello sonata. The two latter works were most excellently played by the composer and Messrs. Arnold Rosé and Buxbaum.

The members of the South London Musical Council availed themselves of the invitation of Sir Francis Campbell, LL.D., to inspect the practical training of the blind in the literary, musical, physical and technical departments of the Royal Normal College and Academy of Music for the Blind, Upper Norwood, on June 25. The weather was unfavourable, but those who were present were repaid by the exhibition of skill displayed by the students. Considerable interest attached to the presentation of a scholarship for £25 by the Musical Council. Dr. G. F. Huntley (Chairman) said that he and Dr. F. N. Abernethy (Vice-chairman) were agreed that it should be presented to Wilfrid Kershaw, a boy of fifteen, who had rendered pianoforte solos from the works of Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Chopin and Schubert, and accompanied the choir in choruses from MacCunn's 'Lord Ullin's Daughter' in a masterly manner. He also displayed great gifts of improvisation. It is gratifying to record that the Council of the South London Musical Festival is intent upon developing latent resources in this direction, and has offered two scholarships of £25 each for 1911.

Mr. S. Coleridge-Taylor has returned from his visit to America, undertaken for the purpose of conducting a performance of 'Hiawatha's Wedding-feast' and the 'Death of Minnehaha' by the Litchfield County Choral Union. Mr. Carl Stoeckel is, apparently, a gentleman with sufficient leisure, musical enthusiasm, and money, to own what he calls a 'music-shed,' and to give therein private invitation concerts with the aid of the above-mentioned choir. It was in this shed, which seats 1,650 persons, that Mr. Coleridge-Taylor was invited to conduct, and thus received an honour previously accorded to Horatio Parker and George Chadwick.

A concert for 'young people of school age' was given in Queen's Hall, Edinburgh, on June 29, when a programme of considerable interest was presented. It included Beethoven's Trio for pianoforte, violin and violoncello, Op. 1, No. 1, Haydn's Trio for the same instruments in G major, instrumental solos by Boccherini, Scarlatti, Bach and Wieniawski, and songs by Schubert and Schumann, also Irish and Scottish folk-songs. The performers were Miss Copeland (violin), Mr. D. Millar Craig (violoncello), Mr. A. W. Dale (pianoforte) and Mr. George Campbell (vocalist). Professor Niecks presided, and made a few explanatory remarks before each number. About 800 children and others were present, and the concert was very successful.

An interesting Classical Chamber Concert was given in the Town Hall, Eastbourne, on June 29, by Mr. Francis J. Foote, the promoter being ably supported by the Wessely Quartet, Dr. Theo. Lierhammer, and Mr. Foote's choir of one hundred voices from Tunbridge Wells. The programme included string quartets by Borodin, Dvorák, and a recently composed string quartet by Mr. Foote; vocal solos by Handel, Purcell and Grieg; French folk-songs; and part-songs by Brahms, Tchaikovsky and Francis J. Foote. The audience was large, and very enthusiastic throughout.

The balance sheet of the Westmorland (Kendal) Festival for 1910 has been issued. Liberal donations and a long subscription list have enabled the Committee, in spite of their heavy expenses, to reduce their deficit to under £100. The expenditure was £1,313 8s. 11d., of which professional fees consumed £844 2s. 9d.; the receipts were £1,159 12s. 10d., of which no less than £490 1s. 6d. was due to subscriptions and donations. The balance from the previous festival was £5 8s. 3d.; the reserve fund supplied £52 9s. 4d., and thus the deficit was brought down to £95 18s. 6d. The treasurer is Mr. Gordon Somervell.

It is interesting to note that the Harlech musical festival, which was abandoned twenty-four years ago after a life of over twenty years, has been revived this year. It was held on July 6, with tremendous success, in the courtyard of the old castle. A massed choir of 1,300, under the direction of Mr. O. O. Roberts, gave three concerts all in the one day. In the evening 'The Messiah' was sung to an audience of 4,000 inside, besides a large number outside the castle. The morning meeting was presided over by Mrs. Mary Davies, who made her first public appearance as a singer at a Harlech festival in the early seventies.

The Musical Union of Christchurch, New Zealand, celebrates its jubilee this year. Since its inauguration in 1860, as the Canterbury Vocal Union, this Society has had a bright career. It has given a continuous series of concerts, and has steadily grown in size and importance. In 1869 it became the Christchurch Musical Society, and in 1894 it joined forces with an orchestral body and adopted the present title. The most recent performance by the Musical Union of which we have record is that of Gounod's 'Faust,' on May 31. The conductor is Dr. Bradshaw, who succeeded Mr. F. M. Wallace this year.

The progress of music in the Transvaal is helped by the efforts of Mrs. W. Deane. On June 25 she delivered the first lecture on music that has been given at Transvaal University College, Johannesburg. Her subject was Robert Schumann, whose works she herself illustrated at the pianoforte. Her remarks dealt with Schumann's life and works in a comprehensive and interesting manner.

The following pupils of York Minster Choir School have been successful in passing with 'honours' in the midsummer examinations of Trinity College of Music, London: Senior advanced pianoforte playing, Charles Ernest Connell; junior pianoforte playing, Charles E. Mennell; junior theory of music, Wallace Harold Pink (obtained maximum marks, 100), John W. Breckon and Cecil W. Hamilton.

An 'Old Etonian' concert was given in the School Hall on June 26, with a programme entirely selected from the compositions of former Eton boys. The music was not lacking in distinction, as can be judged from the following list of composers represented: F. S. Kelly, T. A. Arne, G. S. K. Butterworth, A. M. Goodhart, R. T. Woodman, C. H. H. Parry and Roger Quilter.

With reference to the statement in our last month's issue that the Royal College of Music gave the only performance of Sir Charles Stanford's opera 'Shamus O'Brien' between 1896 and 1910, our attention has been called to the fact that this opera was performed twice in 1905 by the Manchester School of Music under the direction of Mr. Albert J. Cross.

We are glad to hear that Mr. Stewart Macpherson has recovered from his recent indisposition. He has been spending some months abroad, and has now returned to England. He will resume his engagements in September.

Dr. Walford Davies has been appointed to direct the Choir-training Department of the Royal College of Music in succession to Dr. W. S. Hoyte, who has resigned owing to ill health.

Mr. Adolphe Schloesser, for many years a pianoforte professor at the Royal Academy of Music, celebrated his golden wedding at Paddocks, Great Bookham, Surrey, on July 12.

Owing to failing health, Dr. Max Bruch is retiring at the end of the summer term from his post as professor of composition at the Königliche Hochschule für Musik in Berlin.

Their Majesties The King and Queen have been graciously pleased to confer their Royal Patronage upon the Philharmonic Society.

Answers to Correspondents.

In answer to A. J. Stevenson, whose inquiry we inserted in our July issue, Mr. W. G. Cochrane, of 19, North Fort Street, Leith, sends us an account of an invention by an American named Sandell, of a mechanical apparatus for playing the violin. We cannot give the particulars here. They have been published in Electrical Engineering. Our incredulosity as to the possibility of such an invention arose from the knowledge that on a violin string no two semitones or full tones are exactly alike in width, and it passed our comprehension how a mechanical contrivance could meet these subtle distinctions. But if it can be done we bow (and scrape) to science and meekly withdraw our dictum.

AMBITIOUS wants to know the best way to succeed in a musical career. He claims a good voice and is 'able to play,' and he 'could also compose if he had the learning.' We are afraid there are too many with such ordinary gifts. It is not likely that good teachers will 'adopt' our correspondent, as he suggests, in return for services. The only course is for 'Ambitious' to get good local advice as to his capacity. He might also look around and note the number of capable musicians who cannot all earn a living.

M. C. Y. quotes from our July issue, p. 446, col. 2, line 26, 'Sonata in C for two violins (and continuo),' and asks what the bracketed words mean. Continuo, or as often expressed basso continuo, refers to the bass or supporting part, often figured to show the chords. The term thorough-bass as used in England means the same thing.

PIBROCH.—The word is applied to the irregular martial music played by Highlanders on the bagpipe, and it is also used as a synonym for the instrument itself.

B. W., Bexhill-on-Sea.—The initials L., R., A., used in Elgar's Symphony, are abbreviations respectively for Largamente, Ritardando, and Accelerando.

JAMES GREEN asks for information as to a violin he possesses which is labelled Ignatius Bentye, or Bepyte, Cremona, 1738. The maker is not in Stainer's 'Dictionary of Violin Makers.'

CARDIFF.—Edward A. MacDowell was an American. He was born in New York in 1861, and died in 1908.

R. L. your question as to the various Strausses is answered in our present issue, p. 529.

MAZURKA.—The dance is of Polish origin, and is in triple time.

Other answers are held over, or have been given privately.

THE OFFICE FOR THE HOLY COMMUNION

SET TO MUSIC BY

JOHN MERBECKE

(A.D. 1550).

EDITED, WITH AN ACCOMPANIMENT FOR ORGAN
BY

BASIL HARWOOD.

This edition of Merbecke's Communion Service is based on Rimbault's reprint of 1871, after a careful comparison with a copy of the original edition of 1550 belonging to the Library of Christ Church, Oxford. The Plain Song is presented as nearly as possible in the form in which it first appeared, only such changes having been introduced as are required by the altered wording of our Prayer Book.

ISRAEL IN THE WILDERNESS

A SACRED CANTATA

FOR THREE SOLO VOICES, CHORUS AND ORCHESTRAMUSIC BY
ALFRED R. GAUL,

Composer of "RUTH," "THE HOLY CITY," "PASSION SERVICE."

"We welcome 'Israel in the Wilderness' as one of those works which foster the love and induce the practice of music amongst the people."

—Musical Standard.

"The Cantata contains all the elements of popularity, and it was excellently performed under the composer's direction, and very warmly received."—Standard.

"Effective without presenting any overwhelming difficulties. The part-writing is excellent."—Melodious throughout.—Daily News.

"Likely to become quite as great a favourite with choral societies as 'The Holy City'."—Daily Chronicle.

"Altogether worthy of the composer of that amazingly popular work, 'The Holy City'."—The Referee.

Price Two Shillings and Sixpence.

Paper boards, 3s.; cloth, gilt, 4s.; Tonic Sol-fa Edition, 1s.

Words only, 5s. per 100.

THE PRINCE OF PEACE

A SACRED CANTATA

FOR FOUR SOLO VOICES, CHORUS AND ORCHESTRA

THE WORDS SELECTED FROM HOLY SCRIPTURE

AND THE MUSIC COMPOSED BY

ALFRED R. GAUL.

"No man knows better than Mr. Gaul how to write for voices. . . . Throughout the work we have spontaneousness, elegance, attractiveness, in short, a never-ending charm."—Birmingham Daily Gazette.

"Is indeed a work of a very unusual character. . . . Worthy the study of choral societies of every grade."—North Staffordshire Sentinel.

"There are passages of surpassing beauty and brilliance. . . . From the opening bars to the finish there was not a dull moment."—Pontypool Free Press.

"Admirably written for the voice, enhanced by charm of rhythm and picturesque accompaniments."—Birmingham Daily Mail.

Vocal Score, paper cover, 2s. 6d.; paper boards, 3s.; scarlet cloth, 4s.

Vocal Parts, for the use of Choral Societies, each, 1s.

UNA CANTATAFOR FOUR SOLO VOICES, CHORUS AND ORCHESTRA

MUSIC BY

ALFRED R. GAUL.

"Has made its way wherever heard. . . . Full of the melodious, tuneful spirit which breathes in all Mr. Gaul's work, and will add yet another leaf to the wreath which has crowned the efforts of the masterly composer of the 'Holy City' and other works."—Putney Borough News.

"Mr. Gaul's music is, as usual with him, replete with spontaneous melody."—Manchester Examiner.

"Mr. Gaul's choral writing is always fluent and pleasing, and this is fast becoming something to be thankful for."—Leeds Mercury.

"To the list of works which have proved widely acceptable, 'Una' should be added."—Athenaeum.

"Choral societies have long shown that Mr. Gaul is a composer whom they are glad to accept. 'Una' will find its way amongst them easily."—Daily Telegraph.

THE TEN VIRGINS

A SACRED CANTATA

FOR FOUR SOLO VOICES, CHORUS AND ORCHESTRA

BY

ALFRED R. GAUL.

"Will be heartily welcomed by all who love the art of music."

—Newcastle Journal.

"The work will certainly go through Saxondom in the wake of its predecessors from the same pen."—London Daily Telegraph.

"Must attain popularity wherever heard, and will assuredly be placed among the foremost compositions of this kind by present-day writers . . . treated in a thoroughly artistic manner . . . a perfect wealth of melody and striking individuality of style."—Liverpool Daily Courier.

"Works which have placed him in the front rank of English composers—the 'Holy City,' 'Joan of Arc,' and 'The Ten Virgins.'"—Newcastle Daily Journal.

"The choral writing in 'The Ten Virgins' is alone something to be thankful for, and, as we have intimated, it is only one of the many musical virtues of the Cantata."—Leamington Chronicle.

"BOW AND BROMLEY INSTITUTE CHOIR.—The hall was overcrowded by an audience that was disposed to encore every other number of the work. That Mr. Gaul should have secured this undoubted popular success with a work far more contrapuntal than any of his former works is a remarkable tribute to his power of welding science and beauty into one whole."

—The Musical Times.

"The subject is an excellent one for a Cantata . . . a stronger work than 'Joan of Arc.' Melodious, vocal, and of moderate difficulty, and, like Mr. Gaul's earlier Cantatas, will be eagerly welcomed by societies in search of new works having these characteristics."—Newcastle Daily Leader.

"That 'The Ten Virgins' is a much finer work than the everywhere favourite 'Holy City' we have no doubt whatever. Mr. Gaul has aimed at fine outline and telling colouring, and all that he has aimed at he has achieved."—Birmingham Daily Gazette.

Price, paper cover, 2s. 6d.; paper boards, 3s.; cloth, gilt, 4s.

Tonic Sol-fa, 1s.; Vocal Parts, each, 1s.; Words only, 5s. per 100.

VOCAL SCORE. STAFF NOTATION. 40TH THOUSAND.

JOAN OF ARC

AN HISTORICAL CANTATA

FOR THREE SOLO VOICES, CHORUS AND ORCHESTRA

MUSIC BY

ALFRED R. GAUL.

"Few Cantatas are as rich in chaste melodies, charming choruses, and exquisite orchestration as Alfred R. Gaul's 'Joan of Arc' performed for the first time in Plymouth by the Vocal Association in the Guildhall."

—The Western News.

"Must enhance the high reputation of its composer."—Liverpool Courier.

"The inspiration of a highly-refined musician. . . . The Cantata is even a more masterly and beautiful work than 'The Holy City'."

—Huddersfield Examiner.

"No more charming Cantata than 'Joan of Arc' could have been chosen. It abounds in delicious music. There is not a tedious note in it."—Newcastle-on-Tyne Daily Chronicle.

"Gives the listener a vivid and realistic impression, its attractiveness being continuous instead of spasmodic."—Bradford Observer.

"The Exeter Oratorio Society last night achieved a brilliant success, and it may safely be said, without fear of exaggeration, that never before have they performed a work more satisfactory to themselves or more interesting to the audience than 'Joan of Arc.'"—Western Times.

"One of the most delightful Concerts ever given by the South Shields Choral Society was that of last evening, when the principal piece was 'Joan of Arc.' We cannot speak too highly of Mr. Gaul's work, which is of the most interesting description."—The Shields Daily News.

"The choruses are written with much knowledge of effect, and an 'Ave Maria' and the final chorus of the 'Spirit Voices' may be named as really charming."—London Athenaeum.

"Drew forth enthusiastic plaudits. . . . Of the Cantata, as interpreted last evening (in the Town Hall, Leeds, with a band and chorus of 250 performers), it is impossible to speak in terms of anything but praise. Solos and choruses alike are full of melody, while the orchestration is descriptive to a degree. For each of the principal vocalists there is one song that singles itself out, and each received an encore."—Leeds Mercury.

Price, paper cover, 2s. 6d.; paper boards, 3s.; scarlet cloth, 4s.

Tonic Sol-fa, 1s.; Vocal parts, each, 1s.; Words only, 7s. 6d. per 100.

The gratuitous loan of instrumental parts of Mr. Gaul's works may be had on application to the Composer, Gillott Lodge, Edgbaston, and full liberty is given to perform these Cantatas and to insert the words in any programme without further permission.

SYMPHONY IN G

(No. 4)

COMPOSED BY

ANTONIN DVOŘÁK.

(Op. 88.)

QUEEN'S HALL (February 26, 1908).—"The programme opened with Dvořák's fourth symphony in G major. This is a work which ought to be in the repertory of every orchestra, for it contains some of the most beautiful music that Dvořák ever wrote; every movement is full of lovely melody, and the themes of the Scherzo and the slow movement are, even for Dvořák, extraordinarily fresh and fragrant."—The Times, February 27, 1908.

FREDERICK CHOPIN

AS A MAN AND MUSICIAN

BY

FREDERICK NIECKS

WITH A PORTRAIT ETCHED BY H. R. ROBERTSON, AND FACSIMILES OF THE COMPOSER'S MS.

EXTRACTS FROM PREFACE.

My guiding principle has been to place before the reader the facts collected by me as well as the conclusions at which I arrived. This will enable him to see the subject in all its bearings, with all its pros and cons, and to draw his own conclusions, should mine not obtain his approval.

My researches had for their object the whole life of Chopin and his historical, political, artistic, social, and personal surroundings, but they were chiefly directed to the least known and most interesting period of his career—his life in France, and his visits to Germany and Great Britain.

SEVENTH AND REVISED EDITION.

A HANDBOOK OF EXAMINATIONS IN MUSIC

CONTAINING
600 QUESTIONS WITH ANSWERS

BY
ERNEST A. DICKS,
Fellow of the Royal College of Organists.

PREFACE TO THE SEVENTH EDITION.

Through the kindness of Dr. E. H. Turpin the seventh edition of the Handbook of Examinations in Music includes the latest type of Papers set by Trinity College of Music, London, in their scheme of Local Examinations in Musical Knowledge.

The work will also be found to have been considerably enlarged by the addition of fifty specimen questions, with answers. They have been designed for the most part after the manner of those set in the Theory Paper for the L.R.A.M. Diploma, and also that required by candidates for the Higher Practical Examinations held by Trinity College of Music, London. The author earnestly hopes that these additions will considerably enhance the value of the Handbook, and render it increasingly helpful to students.

TECHNIQUE AND EXPRESSION IN PIANOFORTE PLAYING

BY FRANKLIN TAYLOR.

EXTRACT FROM PREFACE.

In the course of my experience as a teacher of the pianoforte, an experience extending over many years, certain ideas have from time to time suggested themselves to me which have proved useful—to myself, as enabling me to express more clearly that which I desired my pupils to understand, and to my pupils, as tending to facilitate their comprehension of the various difficulties they have had to encounter, at the same time leading them to perceive the most practical means of overcoming them, and thus accelerating their general rate of progress.

These suggestions relate to both the mechanical and intellectual sides of the study of pianoforte-playing, or, briefly, to Technique and Expression, the chief matters implied by the first of these terms being the production of various qualities of tone, the choice of suitable fingering, and the best methods of attacking certain difficulties; while the second, which may perhaps be more aptly designated the means of expression, includes rhythm, phrasing, variety and gradation of tone, the use of the pedals, et cetera.

ESPECIALLY DESIGNED FOR THE USE OF CANDIDATES PREPARING FOR THE DIPLOMAS OF THE ROYAL COLLEGE OF ORGANISTS

ARRANGED IN FIVE GRADES

BY

JOSEPH R. TOBIN,

Mus. Bac. Dunelm.

Price One Shilling and Sixpence.

Whilst primarily intended for the use of candidates preparing for the diplomas of the Royal College of Organists, these Bases may also prove useful to harmony students in general. A blank stave has been provided with each exercise; this not only eases the eye, and so facilitates the reading of the bases, but it also enables the student to work the exercises away from the keyboard.

These Pianoforte Studies have been highly praised by M. VLADIMIR DE PACHMANN, who has expressed his intention of playing some of them during his Recital Tour in the United States. His testimonial is published with the Work, which consists of Twelve Numbers, specially designed to develop power and skill in the fourth and fifth fingers. The importance of trying to equalize these weaker fingers with the stronger ones is unquestionable, as defective execution is more often traceable to this inequality of the fingers than to any other cause.

Competition Festival Record

No. 25.

THE ASSOCIATION OF COMPETITION FESTIVALS.

THE sixth annual conference of this Association was held at Messrs. Broadwood's, Conduit Street, on Thursday, July 14. Lady Mary Trefusis took the Chair. The report was read by Dr. McNaught, one of the honorary secretaries. It stated that the competition movement showed continuous progress. New festivals had been successfully inaugurated at Tunbridge Wells, Cornwall, and Doncaster. The death of King Edward had caused much disturbance of the festivals held in May. The movement continued to have great support from the universal sympathy and publicity afforded by the Press. It was probable that new festivals would be started in Scotland, mainly owing to the stimulus given by the very great success attending the Aberdeen festival promoted by Professor Terry. Twenty-four festivals were affiliated to the Association. Of some 300 ordinary members, only sixty-nine had paid the current subscription. It was estimated that 60,000 competitors appeared at this year's English, Scotch, and Irish competitions.

In the course of some remarks on the difficulty of choosing test-pieces, Lady Trefusis read a letter she had received, complaining of 'Hear, King of Angels,' from the 'Christmas oratorio' (Bach). The writer said:

'... The piece selected does not appeal to us in the slightest degree in the way of melody, harmony, counter-point, rhythm, or in fact in any of the elements of a musical composition. . . . We should revel in something that would give the Celtic nature a chance. . . . but to take sixty people one-third of sixty miles to sing for sixty seconds such a cacophonous muddle is . . . really de trop!'

After the officers had been elected, and other routine business had been disposed of, the various papers announced were read. For the present we give a summary of some of the papers, and hope later on to deal with the remainder.

Mr. R. H. Wilson, who is the trainer of the Hallé Choir at Manchester, and the Festival Choir at Birmingham, discussed choral training. It was a racy paper, delivered with spirit, and many practical hints were given. Mr. Wilson said that intimate, genuine personal expression was now an aim of training. The demand for it had come late in the day. Solo-singing and instrumental performance had long ago made progress whilst, until recently, choral singing had remained stationary. This mechanical complacency had been owing to the fact that composers did not ask for anything else from a chorus. Even Mendelssohn did not offer to a chorus the opportunities he gave to solo-singers. To a soloist he gave 'O God, have mercy' ('St. Paul'), but to a chorus he gave 'How lovely are the messengers' ('St. Paul'), a conventionally pretty melody and a stilted rhythm which invited a stodgy performance. Compare this to 'How lovely is Thy dwelling-place' (Brahms). Elgar swept away conventions and formalities in 'The Dream of Gerontius.' The dawn may have been visible before, but after the demands of this work had been realized, it was felt that the chorist was on the level of the solo-singer. The question became, How could the chorus in their performance interpret the personal expression of moods, situations, and sentiments? The basis of expression was conviction and sincerity. In evolving this temperamental expression, the conductor needed all his tact and judgment. The temperament of the different classes of voice should be noted. Sopranos had plenty of dash and go, possessed dramatic instinct and had a capacity for imitation. On the other hand they were volatile and easily forgot, and they were much given to conversation. Contraltos were easy-going, difficult to rouse, and were disposed to drag. In the expression of anger and indignation, they were slow, but they were effective in expressing gloom and pathos. Tenors were industrious, had declamatory power and a competitive spirit, and they did not suffer from self-depreciation. Basses were the least sentimental and were apt to believe that ruggedness and violent accents would cover deficiencies; they had vigour and dramatic power, but did not command subtlety of expression. They endured chastening with more fortitude than any other section of the chorus.

Frivolity interfered with the fixing of a mood. A conductor who could pattern mood-expression had great advantages, even if he were not a trained solo singer. There must be unity of mood in the four parts. The endeavour to secure mood was a strain upon all concerned. It was well to prepare for it by studying mood-expression in an analytical way and by tabulating. Prayer might be analysed into supplication, entreaty, yearning, longing, and passionate exhortation. The prayer in 'Gerontius,' 'Holy Mary, pray for us,' afforded a fine study. The final chorus in Parry's 'Blest pair of Sirens' was a splendid vehicle for the display of earnest longing. In the same way, contemplation, reverence, awe, adoration, and feeling for the mysterious must be studied. The final chorus of Bach's 'St. Matthew Passion' was a study for reverence. From an examination of the principal works of Bach, Brahms, Dvorák, Parry, Stanford, Elgar and Bantock, he had classified sixty varieties of expression, which resolved themselves into about twelve main groups. If this great range of feeling and mood was to become the stock-in-trade of large choral societies, a separate study must be made of it apart from the ordinary routine. Some would say the idea was impracticable, because of the time demanded and because chorists would object to the discipline and their deprivation of a good song. All these objections must be overruled. The new movement could not be ignored. Composers of the first rank would always be in front of their executants, as was proved by the choral works produced during the last ten years.

Mr. Walter Ford followed with a paper on 'Expression.' It was a closely argued, philosophical disquisition that went to the basis of the laws of Expression. As it is not possible for us to give an adequate summary this month, we prefer to postpone an account of Mr. Ford's ideas till our next issue.

In view of the discussions that arise as to Church Choirs taking part in competitions, we give the following paper in full:

THE COMPETITION OF CHURCH CHOIRS.

By THE REV. A. S. COMMELINE.

In spite of the prominence of 'Competition,' both in the titles of our various associations and in the methods which we employ, the real object of all our work is not competition, but the improvement of musical ideals and attainments in our several districts; competition is used only as a means to promote that end. It should be the aim of every well-conducted association to see that the means adopted do not push out of sight the real object, and to see that the bad elements inseparable from an ill-regulated spirit of competition are as far as possible eliminated. Taking then as our object the improvement of musical ideals and attainments, I ask two questions: (1) Have our festivals resulted in this improvement? (2) Is it well that church choirs, whose raison d'être is religious and not secular, should take part in this movement?

The answer to (1), to my mind, is so manifestly and emphatically in the affirmative, that I shall not labour this point. But this answer suggests a leading thought in the question of church choirs, viz.: If the benefit to music, both in the raising of popular ideals and in bringing about better musical results in many secular directions, is so great; and if these benefits are arrived at without any moral harm to those who have used the competitive system, ought not that form of music which in its object is the highest—viz., the direct worship of God, to have the first consideration? Further, ought not those who are concerned in the public worship of God, in which music has so prominent a place, to consider very seriously whether this system, so beneficial in other directions, may not and should not be used, that nothing may be lacking to perfect the music of the sanctuary?

Now, if the musical attainments and ideals of average church choirs were high, and if without the use of some further stimulus an effective spirit of striving after higher things were in evidence, then perhaps we should be content to say, 'Go on and prosper.' But alas! the average standard of efficiency in both town and country church choirs is lamentably low: so low as to be a frequent cause of remark among unmusical as well as musical people. A choir in town or country that sings in any respect well, is singled out as exceptional. As a general rule one hears bad quality, bad intonation, etc., the evidence of bad method and defective training. At the same time one knows that in many cases a large amount of labour is expended on the choir, and that the cause of failure is not want of zeal, but want of knowledge. The energy expended is misdirected energy, the members of the choir, with all their hearts and voices, are singing badly, and do not know it. The choir trainer also in many cases is well pleased, and the whole matter, far from being cause for ridicule, is cause for tears. Now the evil at the bottom of this is, in most cases, isolation. Each choir stands alone with either no opportunity of comparing itself with other choirs (as in the country), or (as in the towns) with no opportunity of comparing itself with choirs with higher attainments. Choirs need to learn that they fail to sing worthily—why they fail, and how their failures may be overcome.

Now the breaking down of this isolation, with all its attendant evil results, is the great work of the competitive system—and I speak now not in theory but with the knowledge of experience. Let me follow out the case of one such choir as I have spoken of, which decides to enter for competition. The choirmaster and choirmen and boys keenly take up the idea—they work with unusual care upon the set music; they realize that everything must be done to perfect themselves in the work; points hitherto neglected are noticed and improved; tone, accuracy, time, etc., call for special attention. Meanwhile the singing of the choir in the Church services improves insensibly but of necessity. Then, after a time, hopefully, but with many misgivings, they enter upon the actual competition. They do not do their best, from nervousness, but they come out fairly well in marks. Meanwhile they have listened to other choirs, perhaps with wonder at the good results produced from similar material to their own—and in hearing they learn, acknowledge their weakness, and determine to use their knowledge. Then follow the criticisms of the judge, and his often invaluable advice, as he indicates the faults and causes of failure in the individual choirs. The choir returns home with opened eyes. It has, as Rudyard Kipling says of the new and inexperienced ship, 'found itself.' It can never be quite the same again. It has a new standard—as one competitor said, 'Well, we thought we could sing a bit till we got there!'—and, let us hope, a new stimulus to compete again, with an overmastering desire to do better: not to beat such and such a choir; not to gain kudos; not to show that it ought to have been placed higher by the judge; but to do a better best than it had ever done or tried to do before.

Hear that choir in its Parish Church, especially if it has entered more than once for competition, and you must be struck by its changed character—the evident thoughtful care—the increased intelligence—the appreciation of its object—the greater reverence which comes with this higher appreciation—the fitness of the work done for the high worship of God. Nor does the good effect stop there. You will often note a marked improvement in the size of the congregation—for a bad choir is a great emptier of churches—and a similar improvement in the thoughtful, intelligent singing of the people, now led by an intelligent, well-trained choir.

'A well-trained choir'! Ah, 'there's the rub! We have no one fit to train our choir,' you say. But, I answer, I cannot imagine anything much more helpful to a choir trainer than that which is provided for him by a competitive festival. Here he has laid out before him what is worth striving for, what is most to be avoided—practically illustrated by the choirs, practically emphasised by the judge—and he must be indeed of slight intelligence or overpowering self-conceit if he cannot gather a harvest of hints which he can use again in his future choir-training. He will see also what can be done with most unpromising material (that crux of most choirmasters!), if only wise and suitable methods and modesty in aim are used.

OBJECTIONS ANSWERED.

I must now turn to some objections to church choirs taking part in competitions which rest in many minds. They are largely due to a worthy (even if mistaken) fear of irreverence.

(1) 'That a church choir should confine itself to the worship of the sanctuary, and that one should not be pitted against another in public competition.' If unworthy rivalry, 'pot-hunting,' bitterness after defeat, hostility towards opponents were encouraged by competition—if experience pointed to such bad results—then in the name of all that is good, keep your church choirs out of it. But experience points the other way. The rivalry is almost always friendly, pleasant, stimulating. I could instance delightful examples of this. The puffed-up choir learns humility, the humble, struggling choir finds encouragement, the ideals of all are raised, and they are thereby not hindered, but helped to offer more worthy and acceptable service in their proper sphere. I must admit that there are very occasional exhibitions of a bad spirit of rivalry, but I would submit that this spirit is not due to the competitions, but existed before in the choirs, and that the influence of the existing better spirit in the large majority is sure to work for good in the choirs which are brought into contact with it. The bad spirit thus occasionally shown depends almost entirely upon the way in which the choir leader accepts defeat and criticism.

(2) 'That sacred music is in itself unsuitable for the secular work of competition, and that the constant practise of it for testing will cause it to be lightly used.' This is a difficulty which may easily be met by clergy and choirmasters reminding their choirs of this possible danger, and so guarding against it; and by the festival authorities taking pains to see that all due reverence is used at the festivals; e.g., it has been found helpful to ask the audience not to applaud the singing of the sacred works, which at once lifts the competition out of the ordinary routine, and gives sufficient suggestion both to performers and hearers of the reverence which is due.

(3) 'That it is unworthy for church choirs to compete for prizes.' This is an objection of great weight, and can only be met by excluding money-prizes in these classes, and making the prizes of such small value in themselves that the element of 'pot-hunting' is excluded. (Personally I hold this opinion with regard to all classes of competitions.)

Further, I maintain that experience shows that competition, when rightly safeguarded, has an excellent moral influence upon competitors, in that it encourages humility, teaches the valuable lesson how to take a beating and receive well-meant criticism in a proper spirit, and promotes a spirit of comradeship amongst those whose aims are the same—viz., the more careful study and performance of music, whether secular or religious.

Finally, I believe that the dangers of irreverence and the like to which Church choirs may be exposed in competitions are so capable of being guarded against, that they are altogether outweighed by the benefits the choirs may and do receive, which render them more worthy instruments for setting forth the praises of God.

At the afternoon session, Dr. Varley Roberts, of Magdalen College, Oxford, gave an address on the 'Training of Boys' Voices in Church Choirs.' Dr. Roberts dealt with his topic in a characteristic style. He gave much useful information derived from his great and successful experience. He was often amusingly and instructively discursive, and as he spoke extemporaneously and gave very rapidly many illustrations, it is difficult, if not impossible, to report him faithfully in cold print. The main points insisted upon were, first, that the choir trainer must thoroughly know his business and have something interesting to say and to accomplish at every lesson. Next, intelligent boys must be secured. Articulation must be analytically studied. Theory was very easy to teach. Boys could soon learn the table of rests and notes. All that need be known could be learned in two hours. Continually train the boy's ear. This was the really vital point.

Dr. Hulbert followed with a demonstration on the 'Cultivation of Vocal Tone.' As Dr. Hulbert's views on this topic have been already fully explained in our reports of his lectures, it is only necessary to record here that his principles and methods of carrying them out were illustrated very admirably on this occasion. It was somewhat unfortunate that time did not permit of a fuller development of Dr. Hulbert's elaborately thought-out system. The most important contention was that a healthy body was a necessary foundation for a healthy voice. Muscular control must be elastic to be of any real service. The stiffening that came of certain exercises that are much used was a great evil. Students from the Graystone Place Training College (L.C.C.), under the skilful direction of Miss Hughes, went through a series of daily health and other muscular exercises, and in illustration of what Dr. Hulbert has termed Euphonics, a group of lady students illustrated the chief vowel sounds oo, oh, aw, ah, ay, ee in a set of exercises.

The last paper read was by Miss F. Kindersley on the work of the Dorset Choral Association. We reserve our report until next month.

The attendance at the Conference was not so full as at last year's meeting, but it was widely representative. The absence of Miss Wakefield through illness was greatly deplored. A resolution expressing cordial sympathy was unanimously passed.

CLEETHORPES.—June 22, 23.

Sympathetically supported by the local public body and energetically organized by the hon. secretaries, Messrs. H. Brumpton and S. G. Dilnot, this festival was carried to success. The competitions produced some excellent artistic results. The chief choral competition attracted entries from over a wide area.

The first day was devoted to children's competitions. The solo prizes were won by Lilian A. White (girls' solo-singing), Herbert Smith (boys' solo-singing), Alfred Turner (sight-singing), Robert W. Dove (pianoforte), and Arthur Hare (violin). St. Mary's Infants', Grimsby (Miss A. M. Saunders), and Chapman St., Grimsby (Mr. F. B. Potter) won prizes for action songs, and Edward St. Senior Girls, Grimsby (Miss E. V. Orford) for Morris dancing. The winning schools in the choral contests were as follows:

- Sight-reading.—Frodingham Boys' (Mr. L. J. Beardsley).
Day Schools.—Test: 'I know a bank' (Horn). 10 entries.
1st. Welholme Girls', Grimsby (Miss P. Market).
2nd. Bursar St. Boys', Cleethorpes (Mr. T. G. Patterson).
Sunday Schools.—Test: 'The robin' (Haynes).
1st. Garibaldi Street P.M. (Mr. Percy Wilson).
Challenge Banner Class.—Test: 'Patter, patter' (Hatton). 11 entries.
1st. Edward St. Senior Boys', Grimsby (Mr. Sam Lee).
2nd. Welholme Girls', Grimsby (Miss P. Market).

In the adult competitions, held on the second day, the successful soloists were: Miss Gladys Hunter (pianoforte), Mr. G. J. Hesland (violin), Miss Elizabeth Tartellin (soprano), Miss Edith Allen (contralto), Mr. Ernest Fisher (tenor), and Mr. W. Edge (bass). Nottingham Harmonic were the best of three mixed-voice quartets. In the event open to local choirs, Grimsby Garibaldi P.M. (Mr. Percy Wilson) were successful. The tests, entries, and results in the chief choral contest were as follows:

- Tests: (a) 'My love dwelt in a Northern land' (Elgar);
(b) 'Allan-a-dale' (C. H. Lloyd).
Cleethorpes Choral Society (Mr. D. Jessop).
Killingholme and Ulceby Choral Society (Mr. T. A. Wood).
2nd. Grimsby Co-operative Choral Society (Mr. J. A. Thomas).
1st. Grimsby Garibaldi P.M. Choir (Mr. P. Wilson).
Cleethorpes Harmonic Choral Society (Mr. F. W. Barracrough).
Mr. Harry Evans adjudicated.

NONCONFORMIST CHOIR UNION.

MANCHESTER, June 25.

This popular event took place at the White City, Manchester. There was a large attendance of the public. The choral performances were, on the whole, excellent. Mr. Blacow's choir was in fine form, especially in 'On Himalay.'

MIXED-VOICE CHOIRS (Open Class).

Tests: 'Welcome to Spring' (Moellendorff); and 'On Himalay' (Granville Bantock).

- Manchester Clarion Vocal Union (Mr. Thos. Corlett).
Ashton Choral Society (Mr. R. W. Walker).
1st. Salford Vocal Society (Mr. Fred W. Blacow).
2nd. Oldham Harmonic Society (Mr. Hy. Hannam).

N.C.U. CHOIRS ONLY.

Tests: 'A gallant Swabian captain' (Hegar); and 'Corydon, arise' (Stanford).

- tied (Moss Side Baptist (Mr. George Ramage).
2nd. (Farnworth Baptist (Mr. James Hurst).
1st. Radcliffe Bridge Wesleyan (Mr. Edward Barnes).
Hurst United Methodist (Mr. William Andrew).

Solo singing is much in vogue in this quarter. Some very well-equipped singers appeared, but many with good voices ruined their chances by practically ignoring the rhythm, dwelling upon notes at random, and ignoring the accompaniment. The tests and winners were as follows:

- Soprano (18 entries).—'From mighty kings' (Handel).
Miss Ethel Oldfield.
Contralto (17 entries).—'Sapphic Ode' (Brahms).
Miss Lily Welch.
Tenor (13 entries).—'My hope is in the Everlasting' (Stainer).
Mr. James E. Wrigley.
Bass (28 entries).—'The Watchman' (Squire).
Mr. Albert G. Dalgleish.
Dr. McNaught adjudicated.

NONCONFORMIST CHOIR UNION.

CRYSTAL PALACE, July 2.

This competition is an important adjunct of the great choral festival reported elsewhere. One test-piece is stipulated and another is 'own-choice.'

The following is a list of the choirs and their second test-pieces:

- CLASS A (for choirs of not less than 26, and not more than 40 voices).
Test: 'The earth is the Lord's' (Alfred Hollins).
1st. Matlock P.M. (Mr. L. G. Wildgoose).
'The fisherman's good-night' (Bishop).
Deptford Central Hall (Mr. B. Gunton Smalley).
'Daybreak' (Gaul).
CLASS B (for choirs of not less than 16, and not more than 25 voices).
Test: 'He, watching over Israel' (Mendelssohn).
Catford Hill Baptist (Mr. Edward J. Sainsbury).
'There is beauty on the mountain' (Goss).
Reigate Congregational (Mr. Fred J. Buckland).
'Come to me, gentle sleep' (Cowen).
Dartford Wesleyan (Mr. Edwin H. Phillips).
'Moonlight and music' (Pinsuti).
Anerley Wesleyan (Mr. A. J. Heard-Norrish).
'In the Springtime' (Pinsuti).
2nd. Park Road Wesleyan, Rushden (Mr. Fred Betts).
'Moonlight and music' (Pinsuti).
Chatham Central Hall (Mr. Percival Smith).
'The shepherds' song' (Mauder).
1st. Saxe Coburg St. Wesleyan, Leicester (Mr. A. E. Nicholls).
'To the evening star' (Cowen).

Solo-singers came in embarrassing numbers. The winners were exceptionally good. The soprano winner is a young girl who, if carefully restrained as well as trained, should be a very attractive singer.

The prizes for solo-singing were awarded as follows :

- Soprano (20 entries).—Miss Elsie Gothard.
 'Orpheus' (Sullivan).
 Contralto (8 entries).—Miss Gertrude Burridge.
 'The workers' (Gounod).
 Tenor (9 entries).—Mr. T. W. Godfrey.
 'An evening song' (Blumenthal).
 Bass (14 entries).—Mr. Frank Gator.
 'The song of Hybrias' (Elliott).

The adjudicator was Dr. McNaught.

WALES. RHOS, July 4.

At the annual 'Chair' Eisteddfod, held at Rhos, near Ruabon, the chief choral competition was not held, as the only choir that entered withdrew owing to disagreement with the committee. Eight male-voice choirs sang de Rillé's 'Martyrs of the Arena'; the first place was secured by Cefn Mawr (Mr. John Wright), and the second by Pontsey and Rhos (Mr. Watkin W. Williams). Cor o'r Bryniau, Penycae (Mr. H. Thomas) and Gobaith Javeneil Choir, Rhos (Mr. Hugh Lewis) were successful in the second and choral and children's choir competitions respectively.

THE NATIONAL TEMPERANCE CHORAL UNION. CRYSTAL PALACE, July 9.

Competitions occupy an important place in the scheme of the annual gatherings of this organization. They are open to juvenile and adult male and mixed choirs, and to vocal soloists in four classes.

The contests this year attracted, on the whole, a satisfactory number of entries; the contralto solo competition, however, was abandoned, as only one lady offered herself.

The tests, entries, and results in the choral competitions were as follows :

JUVENILE CHOIRS.

Tests : 'How lovely are the messengers' (Mendelssohn); and 'The music of the birds' (Glover).

- 1st. London Road, Portsmouth, Baptist Band of Hope (Mr. R. C. Humphries).
- 2nd. Plashet Park Congregational Band of Hope (Miss H. M. Haslam).
- 3rd. Reigate Temperance Hall (Mr. H. Datson).
- Lordship Lane Baptist Band of Hope and S.S. (Mr. J. H. Lane).
- Stormont Road Band of Hope (Miss Cuthbert).
- Marsh Street, Walthamstow, Band of Hope (Miss K. E. Rogers).
- Barking Road Baptist S.S. (Mr. A. Blows).
- Good Templar Orphanage, Sunbury-on-Thames (Mrs. V. A. Chappell).

MIXED-VOICE CHOIRS (30 to 50 singers).

Tests : 'A lover's ditty' (Stanford); and 'It's a bonnie world' (Bructon).

- 1st. Stamford Temperance, Portsmouth (Mr. A. Harris).
- 2nd. Bristol Temperance (Mr. F. Stone).
- Grays and District Temperance (Mr. L. W. Amos).

MIXED-VOICE CHOIRS (60 to 100 singers).

Tests : 'It was a lover and his lass' (Smale); and 'Hush! gentle wind' (Reynolds).

- 1st. Reading Temperance (Mr. A. W. Moss).
- Cardiff Blue Ribbon Choir (Mr. J. Morris).

Concerts were given by the massed junior choir under Mr. W. T. Sayer, of Portsmouth, who made his first appearance as conductor, and by the massed senior choir under Mr. C. Weedon. A new composition, 'The rose, sunflower, and chrysanthemum,' by Mr. W. Smyth Cooper, created a favourable impression on being sung by the juveniles. The prizes and certificates were presented to the successful competitors on the Handel orchestra by Lady Kirk during an interval in the adult concert.

The adjudicators were Mr. Dan Price and Mr. G. Merritt. Mr. W. G. W. Goodworth is the musical director.

GLOUCESTER.—July 16.

This was a choral competition organized by the Western Choral Section of the Co-operative Union. It was held in the handsome and commodious Northgate Wesleyan Chapel. There were classes for juvenile choirs, adult mixed-voice choirs and quartets. The entries in the juvenile choral section brought forward four well-constituted and well-trained choirs. The test-piece was 'March like the victors' (Dr. Roland Rogers), from THE SCHOOL MUSIC REVIEW. The Mountain Ash Choir sang very charmingly, under Mr. William Morris, and was awarded the first prize. The other choirs were from Cwmbach, New Tredegar and Senghenydd. Five large choirs, of from 80 to 100 voices each, competed in the adult section. The test-piece was 'All men, all things' (Mendelssohn). A musically performance, distinguished by fine tone and dignified restraint, mingled with due expressiveness, placed Newport (under Mr. Tom Stephens) first. The other choirs were from Ebbw Vale, Blaenavon, Gloucester, and Ton. The united choirs sang the test-piece with splendid effect, under the baton of Dr. McNaught, who adjudicated.

IPSWICH, QUEENSLAND.—March 26, 28.

This event was described as 'the most successful Eisteddfod ever held in Queensland, and judged from the competitive standpoint, the best we have ever had in the State.' These words were spoken by the Hon. Lewis Thomas, the originator of these great musical festivals in Queensland. The programme was very comprehensive on the musical side, and comprised also sections for literature and art. In the choral competitions, tests and results were as follows :

PROVINCIAL AND FACTORY CHOIRS.

Tests : 'Thy voice, O harmony' (Webbe); and 'Oh peaceful night' (German).

- 1st. Cribb and Foote's Choir (Mr. L. Francis).
- Lockyer Musical Union (Mr. C. H. Allen).

CHURCH CHOIRS.

Tests : 'Jesu! Word of God Incarnate' (Gounod); and 'When wilt Thou save the people.'

- 1st. East Brisbane (Mr. F. Robertson).
- 2nd. Toowoomba (Mr. S. Hobson).

LADIES' CHOIRS.

- Test : 'Waken, waken' (Mackenzie).
- Toowoomba Philharmonic (Mr. Stanley Hobson).
 Maryborough (Mr. Philip Dunn).
- 1st. Cambrian, Ipswich (Mr. Leonard Francis).
 - Gympie Philharmonic (Mr. J. Goodwin).
 - 2nd. Warwick (Mr. C. H. Allen).

SECOND CHORAL COMPETITION.

Tests : 'Then round about the starry throne' (Handel); and 'Gather ye rosebuds' (Blumenthal).

- Blackstone and Ipswich Cambrian (President's Choir) (Mr. Leonard Francis).
- 1st. Blackstone and Ipswich Cambrian (Patron's Choir) (Mr. Leonard Francis).
 - Presbyterian Church, Gympie.
 - Bundaberg Eisteddfod Choir (Mr. Blaikie).
 - 2nd. Warwick Choral Society (Mr. C. H. Allen).

CHIEF CHORAL COMPETITION.

Tests : 'Hark, the deep, tremendous voice' (Haydn); 'My love dwells in a northern land' (Elgar); and 'Come, pretty wag, and sing' (Parry).

- 2nd. Toowoomba Philharmonic (Mr. Stanley Hobson).
- Austral Choir, Brisbane (Mr. J. L. Phillips).
- 1st. Blackstone and Ipswich Cambrian (Mr. Leonard Francis).
- 3rd. Bundaberg Eisteddfod Choir.
- Gympie Philharmonic (Mr. J. Goodwin).
- Warwick (Mr. C. H. Allen).
- Mr. J. Ives adjudicated.

WORCESTER.—MAY 10, 11, 12.

In the competition for female-voice choirs, in which Buck's 'A farewell' and Herman's 'At night' were test-pieces, the first place was gained by the Newland Choir (Mr. J. F. Bye) and not, as stated in our last issue, by Miss Kingston's Moseley Choir.

ANTONIO STRADIVARI

HIS LIFE AND WORK (1644-1737)

BY

W. Henry Hill, Arthur F. Hill, F.S.A.,
 and Alfred E. Hill.

A NEW AND CHEAPER EDITION.

This Book contains the whole of the original text and most of the illustrations, with the difference that the coloured plates have been replaced by photographic reproductions.
 On the other hand, however, it includes an additional illustration in colours, by way of frontispiece, of the celebrated Stradivari Violin, known as "The Messie."

In reviewing the earlier edition, The Times said: "That the authors were well qualified for the task is plain. They belong to a family in which violin making has been traditional for generations, they have been aided by the family lore and guided by wide and varied experience.
 Thus equipped, they have devoted themselves to a careful examination and comparison of the great maker's instruments, and the list cited justifies the conclusion that there can be few which have escaped their notice. The same journal refers to the book as "the most important contribution yet made to the history of the great fiddle-maker and his work."

THE PIANIST'S HAND.

Prevalent among pianists is the idea that you cannot play well unless you have a special sort of hand.
 This is a mistake. Provided you have four fingers and a thumb, and can stretch an octave comfortably, your hand is quite good. A pianist's excellence depends not upon the shape of the hand, but upon the conditions of all the muscles in the hand and arm.
 The "Brain to Keyboard" System trains every one of these muscles to perfection, and keyboard drudgery is entirely done away with. A full explanation is given in the illustrated Book, "Light on Pianoforte Playing," sent post-free to any pianist on application.

COMPLETE COURSE OF LESSONS BY CORRESPONDENCE,
 THREE GUINEAS (by Instalments if desired).

"PIANOFORTE PLAYING" and other Articles by MACDONALD SMITH, 32 pp., post-free, 7d.

Terms and Conditions for Personal Lessons (to Concert Players only) on application.

M. MACDONALD SMITH, 19, BLOOMSBURY SQUARE, LONDON, W.C.

DO YOU NEED TO

PRACTISE YOUR MUSIC

BEFORE YOU CAN

PLAY IT SATISFACTORILY?

Most players need to practise a new piece over and over before they can give a satisfactory rendering, and probably this is the case with you.

If you were a good sight-player your fingers would fall instinctively and automatically on the right notes, and you would obtain immeasurably greater pleasure from your playing.

Years of daily practice MAY make you a good sight-player, but my System cannot fail to do so.

I guarantee that a pianist of average ability will become able to play any piece within his or her technical ability after three months of about 15 minutes' daily practising. The testimony of hundreds of students will amply corroborate this claim.

Booklet sent free to any pianist.

MISS MARY LUND

(SOPRANO).

SIR FREDERICK BRIDGE writes:

"Your rendering of the Soprano part of 'Callirhoe' was excellent—in fact, it could hardly be better. I wish you all success."

MR. ALLEN GILL writes:

"I have much pleasure in recommending Miss Mary Lund as a reliable and conscientious artist. She is a very good musician and has an excellent voice."

DR. A. HERBERT BREWER writes:

"I have much pleasure in saying that Miss Mary Lund has sung for me in Gloucester Cathedral with very great success.
Her singing of 'I will extol Thee' and her sympathetic rendering of 'Hear my prayer' were much appreciated."

MR. LANDON RONALD writes:

"I am pleased to note your success with my 'Adonais,' and take this opportunity of thanking you for the very excellent way in which you sang it."

BRIGHTON SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY ("GALLIA" and "EVERYMAN").

"The solo passages were undertaken by Miss Mary Lund, whose brilliant soprano voice rang out with resonant and telling effect above the chorus in the stirring Finale. On the termination of the performance there was an outburst of enthusiastic applause, which was prolonged until Miss Lund was brought forward by Mr. Robert Taylor.
Miss Mary Lund gave the soprano solos with refinement and choice expression, and was exceedingly effective in the concerted numbers."

MIDLAND MUSICAL SOCIETY ("King Olaf").

"Miss Mary Lund, who, by the way, is of Scandinavian descent, gave the principal soprano part with dramatic delivery and in a pure and telling voice. . . . In the second part, Landon Ronald's scena 'Adonais' was most excellently sung by Miss Mary Lund." (Re-engaged, 1910-11.)

BRISTOL MUSICAL SOCIETY ("CRUSADERS").

"Miss Mary Lund possesses a beautiful soprano voice of considerable strength and excellent range; she very delightfully sang the lovely solo,
'They softly sleep,' and at once won the hearts of her hearers. Still better was her work with Mr. Lloyd Chandro, in the fine scene which constitutes the eighth number, and again enconiums, more emphatic were showered upon her. . . . Miss Mary Lund covered herself with glory by her vivacious and brilliant singing of the 'Jewel Song' from Gounod's 'Faust,' and filled with delight the audience, who cheered and recalled her again and again until she consented to oblige once more."

The Musical Times

AND SINGING-CLASS CIRCULAR.

SEPTEMBER 1, 1910.

ROBERT SCHUMANN.

(Concluded from page 466).

[The instalment given in our July number contained a sketch of Schumann's life and an appreciation by Ernest Newman of Schumann as musical critic. In our August number Miss Fanny Davies wrote about his pianoforte music, and Mr. Frederick Corder on his orchestration. Portraits of Schumann were presented in the two numbers.]

SONGS.

The human voice, when applied to song, makes a wide appeal not merely because its alliance with words charges it with a definite meaning that cannot be conveyed by any other musical means, but because of its marvellous plasticity in responding to every shade of human feeling. Schumann the idealist, the dreamer, a man whose whole nature throbbled with emotion and yearned for expression, was therefore irresistibly drawn to the song as a vent for the fire within him. Form at the period when Schumann felt impelled to write songs was not his strong point, and perhaps for this reason his conceptions all the more readily adapted themselves to the freedom of the art-song and the narrative ballad.

Schumann composed 245 songs. In estimating their place in song evolution, it must be borne in mind that Schumann had before him the 600 lieder of Schubert, the few great songs of Beethoven, and the ballads of Loewe. He also knew and admired Mendelssohn's songs, but there is no trace of their influence in his own compositions.

The poets whose lyrics stimulated Schumann's genius were Heine, Rückert, Byron, Geibel, Burns, Eichendorf, Kerner, Chamisso and Goethe. Nearly all these poems are founded upon the joys and pangs of the great passion—an apparently inexhaustible topic.

Perhaps fifty of Schumann's songs have achieved popularity in artistic circles, and four or five at least have caught the fancy of the multitude. A song may achieve success by virtue of its inherent beauty, even when its interpretation is possible only to trained artists. But it stands a much better chance of life when it is at once beautiful and expressive, and within the executive powers of the amateur. It is this latter element that accounts for the continued popularity of 'The two Grenadiers,' 'Ich grolle nicht' (I will not grieve), 'Der Nussbaum' (The nut tree), with its charming accompaniment, and 'Er der Herrlichste' (The noblest) and 'An der Sonnenschein' (O sunny beam). Some of the most beautiful of Schumann's songs demand a compass that few singers can command. It would seem that the composer thought too much in terms of the pianoforte and not enough of the limitations of singers. Then in not a few cases the pianoforte part becomes too prominent and obscures the voice part. But when all is said, there can be no question that our inheritance of the beautiful, sincere and deeply expressive songs of Schumann is a precious and great one.

Nearly all of Schumann's finest lieder were composed soon after his marriage. To this period we owe Op. 24 (nine songs), Op. 25, 'Myrthen' (twenty-six songs), Op. 35 (twelve songs), words by Kerner, Op. 36 (six songs), Op. 37 (nine songs), Op. 38 'Liederkreis' (twelve songs), Op. 40 (five songs), Op. 42, 'Frauenliebe' song-cycle by A. von Chamisso (eight songs), Op. 48, 'Dichterliebe' song-cycle by Heine (sixteen songs), and some others of note. All the foregoing were composed in 1840: truly a remarkable output.

Grieg considered that Op. 98A, 'Lieder und Gesänge aus Goethe's Wilhelm Meister,' contained songs of the very highest order which for some incomprehensible reason are almost unknown. He referred particularly to 'Was hör' ich draussen vor dem Thor,' and the most beautiful of all, 'Kennst du das Land' (Mignon's song).

CHAMBER MUSIC.

Just as in 1840 the fever of a desire to compose vocal music seized Schumann, so in 1842 he gave himself up to string quartets and other chamber music. It is stated that he began by isolating himself and studying closely Beethoven's quartets. This year saw the production of the three String quartets (Op. 41), the celebrated Quintet (Op. 44), the Pianoforte quartet (Op. 47), and the charming Phantasiestücke for pianoforte, viola and violoncello (Op. 38). The well-known Pianoforte trio in D minor (Op. 63) was composed in 1847, the Trio in F major (Op. 80) was composed in the same year, and that in G minor (Op. 110) in 1851, in which year also the two violin and pianoforte Sonatas (Op. 105 and 121) were composed.

The quartets, important and striking as they are in subject-matter, are not cast in a mould that gives full satisfaction. Their idiom suggests the pianoforte rather than the strings. It was no doubt owing to the fact that Schumann played no stringed instruments that he never acquired ease in writing for them.

Of all Schumann's chamber music, the quintet is the most widely known and popular. Its beauties are of the lucid kind, and so far it has stood the test of time. But Saint-Saëns said recently: 'The quintet and the quartet with pianoforte have fallen in my estimation, while the concerto, the songs, "Manfred," and other of his works, appear to be more and more luminous.'

ORCHESTRAL WORKS.

In this brief survey of the life-long productions of a great composer, some of his most notable achievements have to be scarcely more than mentioned. The orchestral works of Schumann really deserve close study not only because of their undoubted merits as absolute music, but because of the lessons to be derived from their faults. The weakness of Schumann's orchestration has already been dealt with in this series of articles by Mr. Frederick Corder. But notwithstanding these defects, less fastidious listeners will continue to derive deep pleasure from the unmistakable beauty and significance of Schumann's fanciful and original ideas.

The overture to 'Manfred' is one of Schumann's finest efforts. The subject appealed strongly to his temperament, and here he shows more than his usual power of employing colour.

The four Symphonies are generally enumerated in the order of their publication, namely: No. 1, Op. 38, in B flat; No. 2, Op. 61, in C major; No. 3, Op. 97, 'The Rhenish,' in E flat; No. 4, Op. 120, in D minor.* But the last-named was composed in 1841, in the same year as the B flat Symphony, and not until 1851 was it re-written and published.

Schumann's first essay in this form, the Symphony in B flat, was an immediate success, and so far as the composer's symphonies are now performed, it is still the most popular. It is certainly one of the gayest and most lucid of Schumann's works. It was written during the winter of 1840-41, and the composer says: 'I wrote the symphony in that flush of spring that carries man away,' and for this reason it was intended to call it a Spring symphony. The four movements were originally entitled Frühlingsbeginn (Commencement of spring), Abend (Evening), Frohe Gespielen (Merry companions), and Voller Frühling (Full spring), but although these headings were the inspiration, they were withdrawn because Schumann thought that 'one should not show people one's heart; a general impression of an art-work does them more good.'

The C major Symphony, composed four years later, is of a graver character, and bears evidence of the contrapuntal studies that were forced upon Schumann in the intervening period. The key bond of the modulations and the movements is well conceived and clear. By general consent, the Adagio espressivo is considered an inspiration (Weingartner regards it as the finest movement in all the four symphonies), and the rapture and buoyancy of the Finale are notable features. Yet, on the whole, the symphony does not specially attract.

The E flat Symphony, which was composed in 1850 (an analysis by the late Sir George Grove was given in our December, 1909, issue), had its first impulse from a sight of Cologne Cathedral. The impression thus made was deepened by the composer witnessing a solemn ceremony in that imposing edifice. This suggestiveness led to the adoption of the title, 'The Rhenish Symphony.' Some critics declare this to be the noblest of the four symphonies.

The D minor Symphony was, as stated above, first composed in 1841, and ten years later revised and issued as Op. 120. The classic form is here departed from, and the outline becomes misty. Yet the work is full of expression and deep feeling. The four sections are continuous: the subjects of one movement are used in another, and there are other peculiarities in form that justify Schumann's original intention to call the work a Symphonic Fantasia.

Weingartner has not a high opinion of any of the symphonies. He goes so far as to say that they seem to be pieces written for the pianoforte and arranged for the orchestra, and he declares that they are more effective as pianoforte duets than as orchestral symphonies.

Among the other most notable of Schumann's orchestral works mention must be made of the Overture, Scherzo and Finale, Op. 52, the 'Genoveva' Overture, and the scenes from Goethe's 'Faust.'

CHORAL WORKS.

The English titles of Schumann's choral works (all of which are published with English versions) are as follows:

- Paradise and the Peri. Op. 50.
- Advent Hymn. Op. 71.
- Mignon's Requiem. Op. 98b.
- Song of the Night. Op. 108.
- The Pilgrimage of the Rose. Op. 112.
- The King's Son. Op. 116.
- The Minstrel's Curse. Op. 139.
- New-Year's Song. Op. 144.
- Requiem. Op. 148.
- Scenes from 'Faust.' (No opus number.)

The above are for mixed voices and soloists. The following is for male-voice choir and soli:

- Luck of Edenhall. Op. 143.

The cantata 'Paradise and the Peri' has been strangely neglected by our choral societies. Even in this year of Schumann celebrations there has not been, so far as we are aware, any important performance of the work. If it had been composed recently it would have had a better chance, because it would then rank as a striking novelty. Yet it is at present a complete novelty to most of the choral societies in the country. It was written in 1843, when Schumann's powers were ripest. The story is taken from Moore's poem 'Lalla Rookh,' the German version of which by Emil Flecking had come under Schumann's notice. Its romantic character was peculiarly attractive to the great apostle of the Romantic school.

The 'Faust' scenes form a long and important but a somewhat unequal work. The earlier sections are the least interesting, but in the third part the composer attains great power.

The other works enumerated above deserve more attention than they get.

DRAMATIC WORKS.

A setting of the legend of 'Genoveva' was Schumann's sole contribution to operatic literature. The work was only a partial success, and since its production at Leipsic on June 25, 1850, it has been performed only fitfully. A treatise could be written on the libretto and the music. It is clear that the composer lavished some of his finest thoughts on its composition, but there is something lacking in the dramatic interest, and so it fails to make an attractive appeal.

* The well-known subject used by Bach and Mozart forms a useful mnemonic to the keys and order of the symphonies of Schumann and Brahms:

The 'Manfred' music has more dramatic force and characterization. Schumann apparently intended it for stage presentation in conjunction with the play, but it is more effective in the concert-hall. Byron himself did not intend the poem to be acted. The overture, as already stated, is one of Schumann's greatest flights of imagination and picturesque power, and the invocation to Astarte has intense pathos.

PART-SONGS.

Schumann composed about seventy part-songs and choruses, most of which are unaccompanied. They are for all kinds of choirs—mixed-voice, male-voice and female-voice. Generally they are of the practicable kind, calling more for subtlety of interpretation than great technique, and they all have the saving grace of melody. Some are exquisite, as for example 'The Summer song' (for S.A.T.B.), 'Nanie' (for S.S.A.), 'Sinks the night' (S.S.A.). Others are picturesque and dramatic, amongst which may be named the well-known 'Gipsy life' (S.A.T.B., unaccompanied), and 'Battle song' (T.T.B.B.).

CRITICISMS.

Every great composer has been vigorously and venomously assailed. It is one of the penalties of greatness that it stirs up some of the worst of human passions. In the case of Schumann the most notable attack came from a pianist named Joseph Rubinstein, who, in 1879, wrote a celebrated article in the Bayreuth (note the locality) Blätter. The attack derived its importance from its generally assumed inspiration by Wagner. Grieg, in a scornful reply, plainly stated that Wagner was the real author. As an essay in the art of belittling with a specious show of analytical reasoning, Rubinstein's article has some interest. But it over-reached its mark. The ostensible author was not a relative of the great Anton Rubinstein. He was born in Russia in 1847, and he committed suicide at Lucerne in 1884.

Another general estimate of far greater value is that given by Sir Hubert Parry in his profoundly suggestive book 'The Art of Music.' He says:

Schumann was a typical Teuton in his introspective disposition, his mystic imaginings, his depth of earnestness. The rhythmic side of music did not appeal to him with anything like the elastic, nervous intensity with which it excited a Pole, but rather with the solemnity and orderliness of a German waltz. His department was rather the type of music which belongs to the reflective mind; and the types of thought, both emotional and noble, which appeal to a cultivated intellectualist.

And again:

Schumann, like Beethoven, revels in a mass of sound. But his sound is far more sensuous and chromatic. He loved all the pedal it was possible to use; and had but little objection to hearing all the notes of the scale sounding at once. He is said to have liked dreaming to himself, by rambling through all sorts of harmonies with the pedal down; and the glamour of crossing rhythms and the sounding of clashing and antagonistic notes was most thoroughly adapted to his nature. A certain confusion of many factors, a luxury of conflicting elements which somehow make a unity in the end, serve admirably to express the complicated nature of the feelings and sensibilities and thoughts of highly organized beings in modern times.

CONCLUSION.

It is inevitable in the inexorable scheme of things that much of Schumann's music will cease to have vogue. The works of greater musicians than Schumann have had to submit to the winnowing process of time. But whatever posterity accepts or rejects, it cannot destroy the influence Schumann exerted on the development of the song and pianoforte music.

Grieg, in summing-up his able and loyal appreciation of Schumann, aptly adopts the words which Heine applied to Luther: 'In him all the virtues and all faults of the Germans are in the grandest way united; so that one may say he personally represents the wonderful Germans.'

CLARA SCHUMANN.

In connection with our notice of Robert Schumann and his works, it seems appropriate to give a portrait of Madame Schumann, whose life history was so much bound up with that of her husband.

Clara Josephine Schumann was the daughter of the celebrated pianoforte teacher, Friedrich Wieck. She was born at Leipsic on September 13, 1819. Under the teaching of her father, she soon developed exceptional talent as a pianist, and even in her ninth year became known as a solo player. The romance of her betrothal and marriage has already been told. Madame Schumann became one of the greatest pianists of her time, and she was regarded as the most authoritative interpreter of her husband's pianoforte compositions, many of which were written for her. After Robert Schumann's death she, for a time, resided in Berlin, and later at Baden-Baden. She maintained her position as a leading pianist by playing at Vienna and elsewhere on the Continent, and almost every year she visited this country and was very warmly received. In 1878 she became the principal pianoforte teacher in the conservatoire founded by Dr. Hoch at Frankfort-on-Main. Here her instruction was eagerly sought after by many distinguished pupils, who speak not only of the musical benefits they derived but of the charm and simplicity of her nature. When ill-health caused her friends anxiety, a large sum of money was subscribed in England and Germany and gratefully presented to her. She died at Frankfort on May 20, 1896.

Madame Schumann composed songs, pianoforte pieces, and three romances for pianoforte and violin. The highest opus number, 23, includes the cadenzas she wrote for Beethoven's Concertos in C minor and G, and for Mozart's Concerto in G minor.

MUSINGS IN A LIBRARY.

I could easily go on talking about the ancient theory-books for any length of time, but that I fear to bore you. One fact to which I have hitherto found no exception is that the larger the book the less is to be learned from it. And the less there is in the book the more swagger and inflammation there is about its author. By far the best are those few in which the writer has sought to avoid technical terms and brought himself down to the level of his unskilled reader. And of those few the most striking is a book called 'Music made easy to every Capacity, in a series of Dialogues . . . written in French by Monsieur Bemetzrieder, Musick Master to the Queen of France and published at Paris, (with a Preface) by the celebrated MONSIEUR DIDEROT, the whole translated and adapted to the Use of the English Student, by GIFFARD BERNARD, M.A., perused and approved of by DOCTOR BOYCE AND DOCTOR HOWARD. 1778.'

This crescendo of names is very exciting, but one cannot now accord any merit to either of the distinguished individuals who stand in the light of the humble author. Monsieur Diderot was apparently the father of the pupil whose progress is the subject of the book. Mr. Bernard has translated sprightly French into Johnsonian English, very poorly, too, for an M.A., and Drs. Boyce and Howard have merely permitted their great names to appear on the title-page.

The book, like that of Morley, is couched in genial dialogue: the opening sentences afford a fair sample of the style:

DIALOGUE I.

Master. Disciple.

Dis. Now tell me, Sir, have you a great deal of patience?

Mas. Aye, and many other rare qualities, without which I should be but a sorry master. A good master should not only know what he teaches, but be able to teach what he knows; he must vary his lessons according to the various capacities of his scholars; he must be clear; he must be exact; he must be honest and disinterested; but, in particular, he must be gay.

Dis. And you are all this?

Mas. Undoubtedly.

Dis. And we shall laugh, and I shall learn?

Mas. Nothing more sure.

Dis. And I shall play and be able to accompany in concert?

Mas. I will answer for it.

Dis. And do you think that one day or other (I mean with time) I might not be able to compose?

Mas. Unfortunately that is the only thing I cannot promise. I will teach you the art of Accords (sic), Harmony, or thorough Bass, as we call it; I will render the execution and reading of music easy to you, but composition is the affair of genius, and cannot be taught.

Dis. That is a pity.

Mas. Not but there are some people, who, without genius, pretend to it, and succeed well enough; but they are compilers, not composers; for this work, indeed, if you will condescend to it, I will provide you needle and thread.

We of the present day may smile at the quaint idea (still cherished by some) that only those need to learn how to compose to whom the knowledge will be of no use, but for the rest Mr. Bemetzrieder's views are sound enough. Miss Diderot, a truly delightful pupil, takes in all she is told (we are assured that these dialogues are from the life) and rallies her teacher with great spirit. She plays him a piece, and he says:

Mas. These fingers want little—the piece is beautiful, and almost well played.

Dis. You may imagine I don't begin with you by the piece I play worst.

The study of harmony is then commenced, and even the rudiments rendered quite entertaining. The teacher is certainly unconventional when he says such things as:

Mas. Well, what do you wait for?

Dis. Sir, if it is your intention that I should profit by your lessons, give me time to put your rules, exceptions and observations, a little in order in my head.

Mas. A sure means to know nothing is to want to retain everything equally. Catch at first what you can without effort and without pain: the rest will come, and little by little you will possess all.

And again, when the pupil grumbles at the difficulties which are confronting her:

Mas. How long have we studied Harmony together, Madam?

Dis. Why, between four and five months.

Mas. And you complain! Tell me the science, the art, nay, the trade the most miserable (sic) which requires not infinitely more time to learn, as well as application . . . how long were you taught upon the harpsichord before you were able to read and execute a Sonata passably?

Dis. Umph! six—seven years, I believe; it came little by little.

Mas. How! and you who have so excellent a disposition! . . . How many years practice do you imagine the learned men whose works you so much admire, must have had before they arrived at the knowledge capable of producing them?

Here the worthy author, like other people, forgets his former assertion that composition cannot be learned. Here is another amusing specimen:

Dis. I had the fancy to heap several Discordant Chords one after another, upon the same note, without minding to save [i.e., resolve] them all. I would be learned and appear so.

Mas. That is the rage of beginners; when you know more you will endeavour to be easy, agreeable and singing.

At the end the young lady produces with much pride a Prelude which she has composed in the key of G sharp major, to the great amusement of her master, who is unkind enough to print it in his book, a touch of realism which was hardly judicious from any point of view. Apart from this, Mr. Bemetzrieder's earnest and readable book has only the common fault of prolixity.

Another curious work is one of the same period—1782, to be exact—by Salvatore Bertezèn—whoever he may be. He has had it printed with an English translation in parallel columns, and old Richard Stevens, the Charterhouse organist, has written on this copy: 'The Translation is so execrable as hardly to be understood and is generally downright Nonsense.' As to that I have seen many worse specimens, especially in the opera librettos, but in this case the original is so foolish and vulgar as to make it not worth taking pains over. Here is a specimen :

A good practical master might be of much use to a student in all these points ; but envy, insufficiency, defect in communicating ; or, on the other side, levity, ill-manners, merited rewards withheld ; are generally the obstacles to music-masters.

One may generally suspect these writers who vent their spleen in their instruction books, of being very indifferent teachers. There is a curious work called 'The Miseries of Music-masters,' by Ambrose Pitman, Esquire, which the writer has endeavoured to brighten by throwing it into Hudibrastic verse. He diverges from his text at every few pages to sneer at the foolish people who insist upon learning music when they have no talent. As thus :

Cases will frequently occur
When ign'rant Parents will demur
And deem a Master void of sense
(Though sanctioned by experience)
If he adopts a mode of learning
Contrary to their own discerning.
Some, of a contumacious spirit,
Will estimate a Master's merit
Exactly by (O sad mistakes !)
The progress that his Pupil makes.
Forgetting 'Nature's hand divine
'Bestows not these sensations fine
'On all, with aptitude to feel
'What soft melodious modes reveal ;
'That few have talents to attain
'Perfection 'mongst the tuneful train.'

The parents' theory is quite a sound one, and pupils, whatever their talents, are not likely to make much progress when taught after this fashion :

The Art of Fing'ring is so plain,
Not to require much acumen ;
Only observe this simple fact,
The Thumbs beneath the Fingers act.
And then the proper places are Fixed on the angles of a square !
Or, as—(the simile will suit)
A Cube's the third part of a Root.

which is neither good rhyme, grammar, sense nor fact. The author concludes his work, after some thousand lines of alternate laying down the law and grumbling, with these lines :

Unhappy wight ! to whom belong
Th' unceasing Miseries of song !
Who never, through life's progress knows
Cessation from his daily woes
Nor finds release—until he dies,
FROM MUSIC MASTERS' MISERIES ! ! !

It is difficult to imagine such a book as this ever having found a publisher. It is exceedingly rare, and is only sought for by collectors on account of the droll coloured frontispiece by George Cruickshank. For one learner to whom it may have been of service there are most probably a thousand who have learned their rudiments with ease and pleasure from the old chap-book with the delightfully crude illustrations, which begins :

Said Ann to her sister Maria one day :
'If you wish it, my dear, I will teach you to play ;
For since Music is now so well known 'tis agreed,
Not to play the piano were foolish indeed.'

and then (like all the other books), appearing to consider that the grammar of music and the art of playing an instrument are one and the same thing, going on to expound the 'Elements' in very decent amphibrachic couplets, concluding with :

And when friends crowd around us the music to hear,
Think what pleasure 'twill give both to them and you, dear.

which is a better incentive to progress than for the teacher to complain of his or her sufferings. I used to think Ann (who changed the colour of her dress on every fresh page) a much nicer teacher than my own poor mother, who certainly suffered as well as caused much discomfort in the process of instructing her large family.

THE COPYRIGHT BILL.

On July 26 the President of the Board of Trade introduced the new Copyright Bill into the House of Commons, when it was read for the first time and ordered to be printed. In somewhat apologetic terms he indicated that the object of introducing the Bill at the end of the session was to afford ample opportunity for the consideration and discussion of its provisions. If the Bill should hereafter receive as much consideration and discussion inside the House as it is already receiving outside, the object which he had in view is not likely to fail, and when the time comes for printing the Bill in its final form, the President of the Board of Trade will hardly recognise his own offspring. A careful perusal of its sections suggests that it can hardly have been intended for anything but a mere draft, and at present it is impossible to foretell what shape it will ultimately assume. But taking it as it is, it contains so many novel, and in many cases extraordinary features, that no time should be lost in considering their effect upon the important form of property with which it deals.

Two startling innovations are apparent at the outset. First, British Copyright is no longer to pervade the entire British Dominions. The five self-governing Colonies are hereafter to be allowed either to adopt the Act, with such modifications as may be necessary to apply it to the circumstances of each Colony, or to repudiate it. These Colonies are Canada, Australia, New Zealand, The Union of South Africa, and Newfoundland. Any one or more of these Colonies substantially adopting the Act will be regarded as heretofore as a part of Great Britain for copyright purposes. The remaining self-governing Colonies will be treated as a Foreign Country which is not a party to the Berne Convention, and British Copyrights will become unprotected in those Colonies. This, however, will only apply to Copyrights published after the Act comes into force, i.e., January 1, 1912, or at such later date as the Act may be adopted in the Colonies.

The second innovation to be noticed is that hereafter there is to be no distinction between the two, at present absolutely independent, rights: Copyright and Performing right. Both rights are included in the one expression 'Copyright.' Copyright will include both rights unless Performing right is excepted. This is likely to create considerable difficulty, and there are indications in the Bill itself that the draughtsman realised the fact.

Copyright hereafter is not to be infringed by anyone who makes for his private use an adaptation, transposition, arrangement or setting of a musical work. He may not copy the work as published, but he may manipulate it as indicated. 'Private use' is not defined, and there is no provision for ensuring that a work made for private use will be never used for any other purpose. This is a most dangerous provision, unfair to composer and publisher alike. The manipulation of a composer's work, which has always been deprecated as regards its application to mechanical instruments, is now to be permitted by anyone who makes such an arrangement for his 'private use.' It seems obvious that if the making is once made lawful, all control over its actual use will be absolutely lost.

The term of Copyright is to last for fifty years after the composer's death, and there is added an extraordinary provision that after the composer's death any 'person interested' may apply to the Comptroller of Patents for a licence to reprint a Copyright work on such terms as to price and payment of Royalties to the owner of the Copyright as the Comptroller may decide, on the ground that the work is being withheld from the public, or that the price is too high. A similar provision is reserved in favour of the self-governing Colonies, and it is not difficult to imagine to what extent 'interested persons' in the Colonies will avail themselves of the facilities afforded. The provision does not state whether the Comptroller is to be at liberty, when he grants a licence for the work to be reprinted at a reduced price, to reduce also the Royalty payable to the composer! But as Royalties are dependent upon price, it would appear that he could hardly reduce the one without dealing with the other. This is not likely to be appreciated by composers who have favoured the Royalty system as a future provision for their widows and children.

Registration at Stationers' Hall is, as now, not compulsory, but a new feature of the Bill practically makes it so; for section 6 says that there shall be no remedy against an 'innocent infringer,' except an injunction, if the infringer proves that he did not know and had no reasonable means of knowing that the work was copyright. But it also provides that when a work is registered, the infringer will be presumed to know that the work is copyright. This practically means that all right to damages will disappear unless the work is registered. And as the Act is retrospective, it would seem to follow that all existing Copyrights will have to be registered before damages for their infringement can be obtained.

The benefit of the extended period of Copyright is not to belong to an assignee of the original Copyright, unless of course his assignment included the benefit of any future extension; but it is to belong to the executors of the deceased composer. The original publisher, however, has the option of acquiring the extended interest on terms to be determined, if necessary, by arbitration. It was pointed out during the discussion on the subject by Lord Gorell's Committee that this would practically wreck such publications as dictionaries, encyclopædias, magazines, music albums, hymn and tune books, chant books, &c., &c. The Bill has accordingly attempted, in an absolutely futile manner, to provide for the continuity of such publications, called 'Collective works,' even after the original period of Copyright has expired, as regards some or all of the items comprised in the work. It is essential that this should be done effectively, otherwise hymn books and other collective works, which are so numerous, will have to be dismembered as soon as the Copyright of the first item included in them expires. Failure to effect this would mean putting a work like Hymns Ancient and Modern, or Grove's Dictionary, out of print!

At the meetings of Lord Gorell's Committee it was pointed out that the proviso to Section 6 of the International Copyright Act of 1866 needed improvement. The object of that proviso was to protect the vested interests of everyone who might have reprinted a work in this country which had forfeited its International Copyright through failure to comply with the provisions of the earlier International Acts. In certain cases the lost rights would be revived by the operation of the Act of 1886, but a clause was inserted in that Act to protect the interests of those who might in the meantime have reprinted the works affected. The clause, however, only protected works which might have been actually produced when the Act took effect. It was suggested at the meetings referred to that anyone who had spent money in preparing for such production needed a similar protection, even though the work might not have been actually produced at the time when the Act took effect.

The Bill now under consideration adopts that view. But, curiously enough, while it provides for the suggested improvement, it would appear to have overlooked the necessity of re-enacting the clause which gave the original measure of protection. If this is a correct reading of the Bill, it is a point of the utmost importance to the publishers of a large number of reprinted foreign works.

One of the most important concessions made by the Bill to owners of Copyright property is that which grants to them the sole right of making and authorising the making of records, perforated rolls, and other contrivances for the mechanical performance of any literary, dramatic or musical work. Having regard to the very strong recommendations of Lord Gorell's Committee, this could hardly have been otherwise, but it is greatly to be regretted that a large number of existing Copyright works will be deprived of the benefits of this concession; for the Bill provides that all works of which such records or contrivances have been lawfully made by any person prior to July 26, 1910, are to forfeit the right altogether. That is to say, if any manufacturing firm has at any time prior to July 26, 1910, made a record of a Copyright work, that fact throws the work open to all other manufacturers for ever, even though none of them had made any record of that work before the date mentioned, or taken any steps to do so. This is rather a wide definition of vested interests, of a kind similar to those which the Act of 1886 sought to protect, and the reason of this extraordinary consideration of the interests of the record manufacturers is difficult of comprehension.

As regards foreign countries the Bill provides that His Majesty may by Order in Council extend the benefits of the Act to any country which grants reciprocal privileges to British subjects. This is the plan adopted by the American Legislature, which, while making no Copyright treaties, frames its law to suit its own subjects, and then provides that under certain conditions foreigners are to be admitted to the benefits conferred by that law upon Americans. But what, under these circumstances, is Great Britain's position with reference to the Revised Berne Convention? It seems strange that an Act, the necessity for which was provoked by the recently revised Berne Convention, should make no reference to that Convention. For the Convention can have no force of any kind in this country until it is adopted by the Legislature. Is Great Britain on the road to retiring from the Berne Convention?

Finally, it is interesting to note that the Bill has, by repealing the Act of 1882, abolished the necessity of reserving the Performing right in music by printing a notice to that effect on the title-page.

From the foregoing remarks it may be gathered that even the main features of the Bill need a deal of reconsideration by the Legislature—and a critical examination of the Bill as a whole suggests that nearly every clause will need the reconsideration of the draughtsman.

THE ORGAN AS AN ARTISTIC INSTRUMENT.

By EDWIN H. LEMARE.

Recently, when reading a criticism of a sacred song in a musical paper, I was much impressed with two remarks: 'Novelty does not get a warm welcome in churches' and 'Conservatism and religious sentiment seem to go hand in hand.' I pondered over these remarks, and, applying them to the subject of this article, I asked myself such vital questions as the following: (a) Have organ builders made the most of the possibilities of this great instrument as a means to an end? (b) Have organists, past and present, made the most and best of the instruments at their command? (c) Has the audience of the day, either in church or concert hall, yet been educated up to realising and appreciating the musical possibilities of the organ? The matter has thus to be considered under the combined headings of the instrument, the performer, and the audience.

Until an entirely new conception is formed of the possibilities of the organ, it will continue to be severely criticised by the serious musician and lover of the orchestra. Whose fault is this? Has the organ-builder after all these years arrived at such a stage in his art that he cannot advance any further? Or is it that so few organists have been either able or willing to help and encourage the builder in his endeavours to go on improving his instrument and to raise it to a more artistic and practical standard? The latter question probably brings us to the real state of affairs. In recent years I have met and conversed with many of the best church organists all over the world, and I have often found them content to regard the organ and organ-playing merely as a routine matter of subsistence, without ever giving a thought to the artistic development of the organ as an instrument.

If the organist is himself unable to develop artistic ideals, it is not likely that he will stimulate a builder who, to a certain and important extent, must be dependent on him for suggestions. Further, if organ builders have to rely so much upon their own resources, it is not to be wondered at that there is a lack of conformity and uniformity in the arrangement of stops, pedal-board and adjuncts of the console generally. In the case of the pianoforte, an instrument has in these days been produced which is of a practically universal pattern, made according to designs approved alike by players and makers. The pianist, therefore, has—say, during a concert tour—a much better chance than the organist. The pianofortes will be uniform and good; but the organs will vary so much that whereas at his first recital the organist may have achieved great success, at his second elsewhere he may have been almost a failure, due not to any fault of his own, but to his having to play on an inferior and differently constructed instrument from which artistic results cannot possibly be produced.

Neither the pianoforte nor the violin has, of necessity, any association either with time or place. With the organ it is different. For years it was associated with the church solely. Hence it was that in 1892, at the Columbian Exposition in Genoa, when I gave the first concert-organ recitals heard in Italy, the audience was not a little surprised to see no priests nor general insignia of worship with which to them the organ had previously been associated in their minds. It is a curious paradox that whereas the clergy and committees are still conservative with regard to the organ itself, and are quite indifferent to any 'orchestral' or 'solo' effects that can be produced on it, they spare neither pains nor money on beautiful paintings, mosaics and other ornamentations for the church. The modern and beautiful designs, with totally new ideas of colouring, by artists such as Clayton & Bell, have been eagerly accepted, and have received the admiration to which they are entitled. Why, should anyone object to the placing of similarly beautiful and modern tone-colours into the church organ?

It must ever be borne in mind that this association of church with organ limits the gathering of audiences. I could, and we all could, name towns innumerable where the organ can be heard only in a church. It is admitted that a large number of people never enter the church: why, it is not for me to discuss. If only some philanthropist in each town were to present to it an organ which could be heard in its Town Hall, or other generally accessible public place, what a magnificent opportunity there would be for a mass of people who are anxious to hear good music.

When people are given the opportunity of hearing good music on the organ they gradually learn to appreciate music for music's sake, and become more critical as to its actual performance. I have a suspicion that many people who go to a beautiful cathedral or church are too much led away by the surroundings. Fine architecture, beautiful windows and other things which appeal to the eye no doubt increase the enjoyment of the music. But the public must not allow the surroundings to blind their closer criticism of the instrument, the music and the performer. If they do, they will never be able to recognise the artistic possibilities that lie in the organ. Of course, neither the organ nor any other instrument is, in itself, artistic. It is simply the medium through which is expressed the mind of the composer and the performer, just as the violin in the hands of an Ysaye may come to life and touch the very soul.

Organists so often fail to put expression and 'life' into their playing. Organ recitals are frequently so colourless and devoid of any deep artistic merit that they prove unattractive to earnest music-lovers. It is not perhaps that the music itself is uninteresting, but that the stereotyped method of performance has become wearisome and has failed to satisfy or to arouse any enthusiasm. This no doubt is one reason why most organ recitals have not yet received from the Press that recognition which has been accorded to the pianoforte, violin and other instruments. Yet the Press is ever ready and willing to recognise and laud what is new, original, and above all what is truly artistic. But if it has failed to discover any of these virtues in the mass of organ recitals, it is hardly to be wondered at that it has even refrained from any attempt to criticise.

Is the reward worth the labour? I say assuredly it is. Is the organ an artistic instrument? I say emphatically 'yes, if properly built and properly played.'

I now proceed to discuss the instrument itself, and I commence by comparing organ-building in England with what it is in America. England is the home and stronghold of organ-building. I know of no European builder of fame—at least in our generation—other than the late Cavallé-Coll, of Paris, whose reputation could compare with the best English builders. In America, a country blessed with inventive brains, there are being produced new organs of a high grade from the builder's point of view. Let the English builders take heed lest in time they be ousted from their present premier position by their American friends and rivals. On both sides of the water let me repeat that organ builders have not received adequate help from organ players, and on this point the American has probably been more heavily handicapped than the English builder. For many years Henry Willis—the father, we may call him, of the modern organ—was the only builder in England who refused to obey the dictates of the old-fashioned left-footed school of organ players in regard to the straight pedal-board. It is difficult to believe that even at the present day there is only one English builder who has persistently adopted the balanced Swell-pedal, and who always gives the full compass on the manuals up to the top C—even though this has been done at his own cost. It is more difficult to realise that there are builders of repute in England who will still give you an organ without the three top notes! Why will so many organists of the present day be content to patch up the writings of composers (and most of the modern orchestral transcriptions) by leaving out all the top A sharps, B's and C's (or play them on the key-frame)? Why will so many still refuse to adopt the balanced Swell-pedal, which in my opinion is indispensable for artistic playing? It seems to me that the fault lies with the teaching which so many organists have received. How can we expect any progress when our colleges and instructors teach us, and encourage us to continue, the methods of organ playing in vogue fifty years ago. In America I have told builders of the perpetuation of these antiquated ideas. Not realising that such clumsy contrivances would be tolerated in the home of organ-playing, I doubt if they took my remarks seriously. In America, organ builders are anxious to do all in their power for the player. If anything, they have gone to the other extreme and have invented so many 'helps' and 'devices' that it takes the player all his time to unravel these mysteries, instead of doing what he ought to be free to do, namely, to concentrate his mind on the music in front of him. However, they are willing to listen attentively to anyone who can prove to them that they are wrong. I recall how eagerly they adopted the Willis pedal-board, and many other improvements such as ivory draw-stops, adjustable combinations, pedal pistons, heavier wind-pressures, &c., all of which I suggested to them ten years ago. Lately they have had a 'set-back' to this progress, owing to the introduction of slanting and cramped key-boards and stop-keys. The best builders, I am glad to say, are now discarding these enticing 'tabloids.'

The more the player studies orchestral music on the organ, the more will he help to advance artistic organ-playing and building. This remark must apply to the fairly advanced player. Such study will broaden his conceptions of interpretation, and will create a striving for the perhaps unattainable—so far as the organ is concerned. He will no longer be content to look upon the organ as a machine on which to play chants and hymns, but he will demand freedom to do as he wishes. He will not accept the arbitrary stop-combinations, with their supposed 'suitable basses' and 'accompaniments' already prescribed for him by the builder. He will realise that he must be unhampered in everything. Instead of copying another man's drawing he will paint his own picture. He will be not merely receptive but creative. He will no longer be content to do the best he can with a few left-footed pedal notes, while he endeavours to manipulate a crescendo with his right foot at the other end of the pedal-board. He will wish to maintain a certain strength of tone for several bars perhaps, without being deprived of the use of either foot. He will wish to play some pedal notes with his right foot, and to vary the Swell shutters by means of his left. He will not tolerate the inconvenience and discomfort of having to lift his hands up above the top manual and resort to the inevitable rallentando while he endeavours to locate a suitable 'stop-key'; or, if there are draw-stops, he will discover that he must have frequent changes on his Choir or Orchestral organ, and will realise how awkward it is to reach the stops when placed on the right-hand side of the keyboard. He will wonder why his fingers ache in playing rapid music, whereas he can play the same passage over and over again without fatigue on the pianoforte; and the builder will explain to him that he had to put those 'illusive' springs into the key action for the sake of repetition!

If the organ is ever to become an acknowledged artistic instrument, it is for those who love the instrument and realise its possibilities to make it such. What they demand, in reason, the builders will supply. It is immaterial to the builders where certain stops are placed, but they must have uniformity. I do not hesitate to say that many of the improvements in the organ have emanated from the builders themselves, and I doubt not that they would have made more improvements had they not been persistently overruled and frustrated by certain rules and regulations forced upon them which long since should have passed out of date.

It has been stated by some that orchestral music ought not to be played on the organ. Let me say at once that I frankly and cordially agree with them, if they will only allow me to add the words 'by those who are incapable of doing it.' No organist is wise who attempts to interpret orchestral music on the organ until he is really able to do it justice. I have known of organists, with little or no executive pretensions, launch straight out on to a full Wagner programme, regardless of the fact that they had never seriously studied a single bar of the great master's scores, and forgetting that the instrument on which they were playing was totally unsuited for such music. Hence what was intended to be received seriously has culminated in burlesque. Let the organist begin with more humble efforts, and by constant study and practice gradually bring himself up to a higher level. If he aspires to Wagner, by all means let him study the published transcriptions at his command; and by so doing he will unconsciously develop slowly but surely a more interesting and artistic style of organ-playing. I can see no reason why a true artist—who has a properly balanced sense of proportion coupled with refinement—should not even accompany the church service in an orchestral manner; provided always he gets a clear 'picture' of the orchestra in his mind, and gives effects which closely resemble it without resorting to anything bordering on coarseness or vulgarity. The style itself is perfectly legitimate in competent hands—it is the abuse of it which brings discredit. A true sense of discrimination is imperative to real art.

The orchestral and more life-like style of organ-playing is the goal at which to aim. But it is not to be attained, and it should not even be thought of, until the student has thoroughly mastered his Bach, Mendelssohn, Rheinberger, &c. A strict schooling in such music is essential before the player can venture into new fields. The foundation must be sure and solid, or it will not be strong enough to keep him within bounds. He must thoroughly know the organ before he can even think of the orchestra. Above all things his aim must not be to imitate the orchestra (which he can never do), but simply to take it as his pattern in the way of expression and tone-colouring. Once his playing has become imbued with the spirit of the orchestra, how great his reward when he finds opening up before him a world of music, new to him, full of hope and joy and possibilities unbounded.

Occasional Notes.

The Education Department of the London County Council recently issued a list of the music which it offers for requisition for use in the Elementary Schools. This Requisition List, as it is called, is in many respects a notable document. It bears eloquent testimony to the great change that has taken place in the ideas of educational authorities as to what music is good for use in schools. The new list classifies separately published unison songs, two-part songs, three-part songs and collections of songs, and, besides, it specifies class sight-readers, music for marching, dancing, drilling and singing games, and books for the teachers' use. Amongst the unison songs, intended of course for the senior classes, we find five songs by Brahms, two by Beethoven, eight by Handel, five by Mendelssohn, eighteen by Schubert, three by Haydn, seven by Schumann and four by Tchaikovsky. The two-part song list is similarly adorned by well-known names. English composers are not forgotten: Arne, Sterndale Bennett, Henry Purcell, C. Hubert Parry, Sullivan, C. V. Stanford, Cowen, H. Smart, Madame V. White and Charles Wood are represented, and a large number of folk and national songs are mentioned. Two collections of classical songs (one with thirty-five and another with thirty-six songs) and all of Mendelssohn's two-part songs are on the list.

It may be wondered how it is possible to teach such high-class music in 'elementary' schools, and whether the children have the capacity to assimilate it and derive benefit from the study. This will depend greatly on circumstances, the teacher's competence, and his skill to gauge the receptivity of the children. Those who are familiar with the musical achievements of the teachers and children in the best elementary schools know that the class of music we are discussing is quite within the powers of all concerned. The education of the taste of the children thus fed may have remarkable consequences, which certainly could never be looked for when the music used was of a poor character. It may be assumed that the new list shows the influence of Dr. J. Borland, who was appointed Instructor and Inspector of Music to the Council a year or so ago.

The visit to Lucerne and Interlaken of the Manchester Ancoats Girls' Choir was alluded to last month. Most favourable notices of these concerts appeared in the Lucerne Tageblatt and the Swiss Vaterland. Tone, blend, execution and interpretation came in for warm praise. The Vaterland compares the work being done by their conductor, Miss Say Ashworth, to that of Gustave Charpentier among the Parisian girls of the Mode-Ateliers. The members of the audience at the second Lucerne concert were so delighted that they raised £20 on the spot, and sent the mill-girls off to Andermatt next day picnicking. What tales and memories they will bring home to beguile the tedium of winter days in dingy mills! The following tribute to the Choir also appeared in the Vaterland:

Everything is still around us, but now even here arises, in mellow, soft tones—singing! Young ladies, evidently overcome by the charm of the hour, draw together in a circle, and a choir of ladies' voices is heard. The soprano is soft and mellow, the contralto full and rich. What they sing I do not understand, for they sing in none of our Swiss dialects, and the singers who, now simply, now artistically, waft their clear and sympathetic tones into the still night are not even Swiss, but daughters of Albion, and so it is all the more beautiful that their hearts also should be touched by the charm of the evening consecrated to the Fatherland [it was the Bunderfest]. What they sang sounded like psalms to the hills, and was to honour Switzerland.

The original autograph score of Beethoven's Sixth (Pastoral) Symphony has recently been added to the collection of the Beethoven Haus in Bonn. In 1838 this autograph passed into foreign hands for a small sum. It remained abroad (ultimately in England) for seventy years, and was offered for sale at £5,000 about two years ago. It has now, after many pourparlers, been acquired for the above-named Institution.

The following works in the programme of the sixth Cardiff triennial Musical Festival, which will be held from September 19 to September 24 have been specially composed for the festival, and will be performed for the first time: 'The Veil' (Cowen), 'The Sun-god's return' (Mackenzie), a Pindaric ode 'The Bard,' for baritone and chorus (David Thomas), symphonic poem 'With the wild Geese' (Hamilton Harty). 'The Veil' was described in our issues for July and August. 'The Sun-god's return' is described on p. 582. Dr. Frederic H. Cowen is conductor of the festival.

In an interview described in the Etude (U.S.), for July, the well-known Viennese composer, Edward Schütt, expressed his views on the development of musical taste, with special reference to pianoforte music and pianoforte teaching. He dwelt on the tendency to cultivate a forced and unreal taste for modern music, while ignoring or hastily passing over the classics:

When a child is brought up in the concert hall on a diet of Richard Strauss, Debussy, Max Reger and such composers, it is naturally an enormously difficult proposition to establish a healthy taste for Bach, Mozart and Haydn. I must admit that I myself when young had a great love for the modern composers and a far greater desire to work Schumann and Chopin than the classicists. In fact, a real liking for the classical composers among young students in our day must, to a large extent, be brought about artificially. . . . One great mistake that nearly all pianoforte teachers make is that of allowing their pupils to begin too soon with the study of Chopin and Schumann. With the average talented pupil these composers should not be touched until the fourteenth or fifteenth year.

Herr Schütt expressed special liking, and claimed special importance for, the works of Stephen Heller. He said:

When I mention the name of Stephen Heller, I speak of a man whose works hold a place very near to my heart. For me he is a classicist of the very first rank. If I were asked to name the two composers whose works have had the most influence on my own compositions, I should say at once, 'Chopin and Heller.' Heller's études and preludes are to me wonderful in their originality and charm, and in the masterly way in which the musical ideas are handled and developed, even in these smaller pieces.

Henselt and Heller were recommended as stepping-stones to Chopin; Clementi and Hummel as a preparation for Mendelssohn, and, through him, for Bach. Some valuable teaching material was pointed out in the works of the half-forgotten composers, Schultof, Spindler and Ravina. Schubert's sonatas, particularly the one in A minor, and Field's nocturnes, he considered as indispensable steps in the progress towards mastery of expression. The study of Schumann should be put off until a rather late date, largely on account of the rhythmic difficulties which this composer offers to the young student.

Theoretical studies, in Herr Schütt's opinion, were entered upon too late by pianists; harmony and counterpoint should be commenced much earlier than is usually the case, and should be taken up simultaneously. Modern developments were discussed in the following terms:

The modern pianoforte composer, that is, the composer who does not belong to the ultra-secessionistic school, is taking a line of developments which I may describe thus: he endeavours to combine harmonic eccentricities (if I may use the expression) with novelties in technical execution. The quality of the musical ideas which one finds in the musical composition of the day is not a very exalted one, except among the Slavic composers, such as Rachmaninoff, Scriabine, Novak and others. The secessionistic writers of pianoforte music, as Debussy and Ravel, seek more for atmosphere, mood-pictures, than for real musical ideas. Take for example, Debussy's 'Jardins dans la Pluie' ('Gardens in the rain'). Here one has a very atmospheric piece of mood-writing, but not a single phrase of which one can say, 'Here is a musical idea.'

Herr Schütt's attitude to extreme modern tendencies was, if not total condemnation, a pronounced antipathy to much of the modern output, especially as exemplified by Reger and the later Strauss. Debussy's pianoforte compositions he finds interesting, if allowances are made for their impressionism.

THE ORGANS OF STRASSBURG CATHEDRAL.

By C. GREEN.

The celebrated organ of Strassburg Cathedral, which has for centuries enjoyed a very distinguished reputation, is one of those remarkable works in which the craftsmen of the late Gothic exercise their ingenuity and gratify their passion for the marvellous.

The same love of refined and would-be scientific construction, to which in our own country we owe the vaulting of Christ Church Cathedral Choir, Oxford, and Henry VII.'s Chapel, produced among tours de force in masonry, of which Strassburg Cathedral itself is rich in notable examples, such romantically conceived and elaborately executed pieces of church furniture as this famous instrument. There is, or was formerly, an organ of somewhat similar appearance in the cathedral at Metz, and several others, no less curiously designed, are described and illustrated in Mr. A. G. Hill's fine work on 'Mediæval and Renaissance Organs.'

The first organ which the cathedral possessed was built in 1260, by one Ulrich Engelbrecht, a Dominican, and formerly a knight. It seems uncertain, however, whether he was the actual builder, or only the donor of the instrument. The nave of the cathedral was at that time being rebuilt, and was not completed until 1275, so that the organ probably stood in the choir, or in one of the transepts. It had a short existence, and was destroyed by fire in 1298.

In an account of the church by Grandidier, dated 1782, it is, however, expressly stated that the organ has always occupied its present position, which is that of the sixth window of the north clerestory, counted westwards from the crossing, and although no authority for this statement is quoted, an examination of the wall behind and below the present instrument shews it to be an original part of the nave and that no window ever existed there; while a second record mentions the erection of an organ by one Günzelin, of Frankfort, in 1292, which was also burned in 1298. The sum of the evidence, therefore, leaves little doubt that the organ of 1292 was identical with that of 1260, and that Günzelin rebuilt the instrument in the elevated position which had been prepared for it in the new nave.

A new organ was built in 1316, but it must have been short-lived, for in 1324, or 1326, one Karlen, a carpenter, erected yet another, which in 1384 was set on fire by the carelessness of some workmen, who perhaps used candlesticks similar to those which sometimes serve to lighten the labours of their descendants of to-day, and caused the destruction of the roof and furniture of the church.

In the following year, however, a new organ was built. In 1412, 'Meister Joerg,' builder of the organ in St. Stephen's Church at Vienna, made some proposal concerning the improvement of this instrument, but we are left in doubt as to whether his offer was accepted. Meanwhile a small organ had, in 1400, been presented by a member of the Chapter to the chapel of St. Katharine, where it remained and was played on Saturdays until the beginning of the 18th century.

THE ORGAN IN STRASSBURG CATHEDRAL.

In 1433-1434 the nave organ was renovated by Michael Grolach, of Leipzig, and Peter Gareis, the organist. The latter had a tragic end, falling dead at his instrument while playing 'Salve Regina' in 1480.

There were at this time beneath, if not actually attached to the organ, grotesque figures called Rohraffen, presumably representing apes, instruments no doubt of that extraordinary usage described in Sir Walter Scott's 'Abbot,' by which in ancient times the Church sought to ease the burdens which she laid upon her subjects by permitting them occasionally to make game, in the grossest manner, of her institutions and her ministers. The exact nature of these Rohraffen is no longer known, but they appear at least to have been capable of making grimaces through the agency of pneumatic motors supplied with wind through tubes from the organ above, and at Pentecost they were accustomed to be tenanted by clerical or lay brothers, who from this point of vantage sang all manner of ribald songs and broke scurrilous jests at the people and the priests in procession below, to the interruption of the Mass and the confusion of all the proceedings.

In 1478 these abuses were suppressed by Johann Geiler, the celebrated preacher of Strassburg, who at the same time abolished the office of the Episcopus Puerorum; which, it is interesting to note, existed no less upon the Continent than in our own country.

Of the fate of the organ of 1434 nothing is known; in 1489, however, an entirely new one was built by Friedrich Krebsler, of Anspach, when the present case first made its appearance. The original design for it is still preserved among the archives of the cathedral, and shows on one side a painted folding shutter, outstretched; and on the other, one of the pierced and carved screens which at present flank both cases; apparently for the purpose of comparing the effect of the two treatments. An engraving of 1630 shows outstretched and elaborately painted folding shutters, attached both to the main case and to that of the Rückpositiv, but although there would have been nothing unusual in this, it seems doubtful whether they ever existed. The present ornamental screens at the sides of both cases, though of classical design, and of later character than the flamboyant tracery-work of the case, are similar to the pipe-shades of the side flats, and to the applied scroll-work which decorates the brackets supporting them: parts of the case which seem to be original. There is, indeed, nothing incredible in the appearance of such work as this; due, perhaps, to the employment of an Italian craftsman, so late as at the end of the 15th century.

It is noticeable that the organ case is not exactly in the centre of the space devoted to it. Its position was doubtless fixed by that of the small doorway leading into the gallery, which shows that the former organ cases were narrower than the present one.

Of the nature and contents of the organ of 1489, no information exists, but judging from the size of the case it must have been a tolerably large instrument. In 1509 it was cleaned, and in 1564 repaired by Sigmund Frippe, or Frinsie, of Freiburg; and finally, after having done good service for 119 years, was replaced by a completely new instrument, in the old case, by Anton Newnecht, of Ravensburg, in 1608.

The new organ was a remarkable instrument, and acquired a great reputation throughout Germany. A description of it existed among the manuscripts of Johann Andreas Silbermann, of Strassburg, organ builder, and councillor of the Grand Sénat; but these interesting documents are now nowhere to be found (excepting one diary), and beyond doubt perished in the fire which destroyed the town library in 1870. Grandidier, however, quoting this description, states that the organ of 1608 had thirty-three stops, and 1,090 pipes, of which the largest was 32 feet long. This instrument was repaired in 1624, and again in 1660, by Matthias Troetslern, of Culmbach, and Tobias Dressel, his pupil, and lasted until the end of the year 1713, when Andreas Silbermann, of Strassburg, father to Johann Andreas mentioned above, and to Gottfried and Engelbert Silbermann, and a native of Dresden, was commissioned to build an entirely new organ in the old case, which he accomplished in August, 1716.

One cannot but admire the patient and loving industry with which the old craftsmen, like Silbermann, or our own Father Smith, laboured year in and year out at a single work until they had brought it to perfection. The conscientiousness of their workmanship and choice of materials is in many cases proved by the durability of their work. Andreas Silbermann's organ in the Thomaskirche, Strassburg, built in 1740, and his son Gottfried's magnificent instrument in the Frauenkirche at Dresden, played upon by Bach, are still used for giving recitals; so is the famous organ at Haarlem, and many examples of the longevity of contemporary instruments might be quoted.

Silbermann's scheme for rebuilding the organ included a design for a new case in the Rococo style, and very like some of the firm's other organ cases; but as a matter of archaeological interest, it can scarcely be regretted that the old case was, after all, retained.

Specification of the organ by Andreas Silbermann, as given by Dr. Hopkins, who visited it before 1855:

Echo and Choir manuals couple to Great by being drawn out a little.
Compass: Manuals CC—C⁸ (four octaves); Pedal CCC—tenor C (two octaves).

This organ had six soundboards, and six bellows each twelve feet long and six feet wide, which were worked in a novel manner.

The instrument was several times damaged, and was repaired and cleaned by Johann Andreas Silbermann, who, besides taking part in his father's business, was a zealous antiquary and the author of several works on the archæology of Strassburg and its environs.

During the bombardment of the town by the Germans in 1870, the organ, though saved by the vaulting from the fire which destroyed the roof of the church, was seriously injured by a shell which passed right through it, making havoc of the interior. It was put into some degree of playing order without delay, but in 1878 a small organ was built in the choir, and in 1897 a complete reconstruction of the large instrument was carried out by B. Koulen et Cie., of Strassburg. Twelve stops by Silbermann were retained, and electric action on the Schmoele-Mols system was applied throughout. There are four main reservoirs behind the organ, whose feeders are worked by two electric motors. The console retains its former position behind the Choir organ, the organist facing the wall. He has here, if not short-sighted, an excellent view of the proceedings in the chancel, though the position must be less favourable to his hearing the effect of the instrument. The drawstops are arranged in four straight and shallow tiers beside the manuals, and have a very short travel. The specification of the organ is as follows:

The appearance of the organ in its elevated position belies its immense proportions; the lowest point of the bracket is 28 feet above the floor, and the top of the case nearly reaches the apex of the vaulting, which is 104 feet high, so that its total height is about 72 feet and its width, exclusive of the side-screens, about 23 feet. The floor of the gallery is 46½ feet above the ground, so that the height of the case without the bracket is about 53½ feet, and of the bracket, the parapet, 18½ feet. The largest front pipes, standing 60½ feet above the ground, cannot be less than 30 feet high, inclusive of the foot, though their speaking length is 16 feet. This gives some idea of the immense scale of the case. These huge pipes are said to produce a tone of extraordinary weight and volume. The 32-ft. pipes which formerly existed doubtless stood in their place, only requiring to rise two or three feet above and behind the pipe-shades.

The design of the Choir organ seems slightly later in character than that of the main case, and the manner of its attachment to the organ gallery also suggests that, although it figures in the original plan, it may have been added through an afterthought on the part of the designer. The curious horn-like ornaments and crocketed finials, as well as some of the tracery of the upper case, resemble some carved work of the pulpit which was finished in 1487, two years earlier than the organ, suggesting that the designer of the former had something to do with the execution of the latter. The whole case is gorgeously painted in red, blue and green, and all the carved and ornamental work is gilt.

The organ nominally rests upon six oak beams projecting from the wall and one or two iron girders added in modern times. We may easily suppose, however, that the soundboards are independently supported in a similar manner. The great bracket is formed by wooden ribs, ornamented with cusping, and springing from their support at the foot of a vertical balk of wood which hangs from one of the horizontal beams, the spaces between the ribs being filled in with panels. It is, unfortunately, a complete fraud, since it supports nothing whatever, the very parapet and floor of the gallery being quite independent of it, a circumstance which tends to diminish our respect for the craftsmen of the Middle Ages.

The great knob at the point of this structure bears a figure, not quite life-size, of Samson slaying the lion; and two other figures, 5 feet high, resting upon small brackets, are fastened to the wall on either side.

All three figures could formerly be set in motion by the organist. That on the left, representing a member of the Society of 'Meister Soengers' of the 15th century, and holding a trumpet, plied his instrument to the accompaniment of the trumpet stop; the figure on the right moved its head and long beard eloquently, after the manner of a preacher, or beat time like a conductor; and Samson slaughtered his lion to the tune of the terrific sounds with which the pedal pipes provided the beast. Such jugglery as this was a common feature of mediæval organs, and has been described at some length by Dr. Hopkins.

The organ is usually played on Sundays and Feast days, but during the last two years it has been altogether silent, owing to some building operations which subsidence of the foundations in its immediate neighbourhood have made necessary. It is at present without its great bracket, and is not likely to be restored to use for several years to come.

The position of the organ, owing to its great distance from the choir, is not very favourable to its purpose, and it is difficult to guess why it was placed there.* The want of an instrument nearer to the choir has evidently been felt from time to time. In 1660 a small organ was placed beneath the screen, which at that time formed the western boundary of the choir; but it was removed in 1702, the whole screen being demolished two years later. The organ now standing in the choir was built by Merklin, of Lyons, in 1878, and is now exclusively used. It is proposed to incorporate its pipe-work in a new and grand instrument which is to be built in its place.

* Access to the instrument can only be obtained from outside, the organist having to climb a turret staircase in the north tower, traverse a gallery, descend another staircase, and finally walk along the gutter of the aisle roof until he reaches the door of the blowing-chamber.

The specification of the present sweet-toned instrument is as follows :

The author is indebted to Herr J. Knauth, architect to the cathedral, for permission to examine the large organ; and to the Abbé Dr. X. Mathias, of the Priesterseminar, Strassburg, for much valuable information concerning both instruments.

The historical information has been obtained from works on the cathedral by F. Kraus, and by Silbermann, Grandidier, and several other ancient writers.

THE ROMANCE OF THE PIBROCH.

By A. T. CORKE.

The Piob Mhor, or great Highland bagpipe, may reasonably claim to be the only national instrument in Europe, its present form and construction being as peculiarly Scottish as the music it is so well fitted to produce. We find, doubtless, early forms of the pipes amongst other nationalities. The Greek 'piovala' somewhat resembled the modern pipes; and both Martial and Suetonius speak of the 'utricularia,' the Roman bagpipe, a modification of which, the 'cornamusa,' is used by the Calabrian peasant of to-day. Giraldus Cambrensis, the Welshman, writing in the early part of the 13th century, mentions the pipes as a British instrument; and in the latter part of the next century Chaucer, in the prologue to the 'Canterbury Tales,' says of his miller: 'A baggepipe wef coude he blowe and sowne.' Shakespeare, too, has a familiar allusion to 'the drone of a Lincolnshire piper.' The French 'musette' and the German 'sackpfeife' are both akin to the bagpipe.

The antiquity of the pipes amongst the Gaels is undoubted. There still exists a 'piobaireachd,' or pibroch, composed in 1299; and in a chapel of Roslyn, near Edinburgh, built by the Earl of Orkney in 1446, a sculptured cherub may be seen playing the pipes, with an open book before him, showing that even at that early date they were played from musical notation and not by ear alone.

A panegyric of the pipes is as unneeded as, on the other hand, any protest against the ignorant scoffing of the profane. It is enough to say that history offers no more gallant spectacle than that of the intrepid march of a man in advance of his countrymen against an enemy, with no weapon in his hand, labouring, with great physical exertion, to encourage his comrades to deeds of glory. Nor should the softer strains of the pipes lack passing mention: the lament that melts the sorrowing clansmen's hearts as they bear the body of their chief to the grave; the strathspey and reel that compel the flying feet in mazy dance, or cheer at festive board and fireside, or solace the shepherd on his lonely moor.

The undeniable utility of the pipes in war and peace led to their adoption among the Gaels in place of the less inspiring harp; an exact inversion of the process in Wales, where the harp has supplanted the pipes.

The hereditary pipers formed no insignificant part of the retinue of a Highland chief, their care being to hand down to posterity the music commemorating the honourable deeds of their family. Their instruction had been given by famous masters at their chief's expense for board and tuition, six to twelve years being given to the study and practice of pibrochs alone, no reels or quick-steps being allowed. The finished piper was a man of dignity and importance: his knapsack was carried by his own gillie, to whom he would hand his pipes when his 'port,' or tune, was ended. The Isle of Skye once boasted a celebrated college of pipe-music which sent out many eminent performers, and at the present day there is considerable inducement to the cult of the pipes by means of frequent competitions and well-rewarded trials of skill.

Amongst the most celebrated hereditary pipers were the MacCrummens, pipers to Macleod of Macleod; the MacArthurs, to the Lords Macdonald of the Isles; the MacKays, to the MacKenzie of Gairloch; the MacLeans to the Campbells; the MacIntyres to Menzies of Menzies.

It is not, however, so much with the history of the hereditary pipers, or with the pipes in general, that the present article is concerned as with the traditions and associations of the 'piobaireachd.' The word 'piobaireachd' is derived from the Gaelic 'piob,' a flute, pipe, tube; and it comprises all pipe-music, whether salute, lament, or march, that has been composed to commemorate some event of importance either to the particular clan or the country as a whole, every pibroch following an accepted musical form of 'urlar,' or theme, 'toarluath' and 'crunluath,' with many variations.

A few notes with regard to some of the more famous pibrochs may be of interest. That well-known pibroch, 'The carles with the breeks,' or 'Lord Breadalbane's march,' was composed under remarkable circumstances. The long feud between the Sinclairs and the MacKays culminated in 1677 in a pitched battle, when Glenurchy, with 1,000 Campbells, utterly routed the Sinclairs. The gentlemen of the Sinclairs being mounted, and therefore wearing breeks, made good their escape; seeing which, Glenurchy's piper poured forth a voluntary, the notes of which appeared to re-echo the contemptuous exclamation, 'The carles with the breeks are flying from the field.'

Just before the Battle of Worcester, 1651, Piper Patrick Mor MacCrummen, in the following of the MacLeods, having played before the king, his majesty was so pleased with his music and fine appearance that he allowed him to kiss his hands. The piper's pride and gratitude are well shown in his pibroch, the words adapted to the opening measure being translated thus:

I have had a kiss, a kiss, a kiss.

I have had a kiss of the king's hand:—

No one who blew in a sheep's skin

Has received such honour as I have.

The fine old pibroch called 'The MacRae's march' was composed in honour of the following circumstances. Amongst the followers of the MacKenzies in the Battle of Park, 1477, was one Duncan MacRae, who speedily brought down his opponent, and thinking he had done all that was expected of him, calmly seated himself on the body of the slain. MacKenzie called out sharply, 'What, sit you so?' MacRae answered, 'If I am paid like a man, I will fight like a man.' 'Kill your two, and you shall have the wage of two,' replied the chief, and the follower did so, and again sat down on his victim's body. 'Kill your three, and fight on,' cried the fiery chief; and MacRae, fighting like a lion, killed no less than sixteen of the enemy, and was afterwards known as 'Big Duncan of the Axe.'

'Chisholm's Salute' commemorates an ancient set of pipes which was supposed to possess a supernatural faculty, in its indication of the death of the chief by spontaneously bursting. The family piper, being away from home at a wedding, heard his chanter crack, and perceiving a large rent, started up, exclaiming that he must return, for Chisholm was no more! And it was found to be so.

'Sir Evan Cameron of Lochiel's salute' commemorates a notable event in the life of that remarkable chief, which is thus described in the appendix of Pennant's 'Scottish Tour.' 'In this engagement (at Fort William), during the retreat of the English, one of the strongest and bravest of the officers retired behind a bush; when he observed Lochiel pursuing alone, he leaped out, and thought him his prey. The fight was long and doubtful; the Englishman was far bigger and stronger, but Lochiel more active; they closed and fell to the ground locked in each other's arms. The English officer was above, and pressed the chief hard; but the latter, stretching forth his neck, seized his enemy's throat with his teeth, and kept such a hold until the Englishman died.'

The pibroch, 'Battle of Waterloo,' composed in 1875 by John MacKay, will well bear comparison with the older pibrochs. The great part the Highland regiments played in the famous battle is well known; and the national dress of the mountaineers was no less an object of curiosity and admiration on the Continent than the peculiar music of the pipes.

About the year 1647, the Earl of Argyll commissioned Campbell of Calder to expel the MacDonalds from Islay, where Coll Cistach, Montrose's officer, resided with a number of his followers. Calder, with the assistance of the Campbells, stormed and razed the Castle of Dunad, from which Coll and several of his followers made their escape, and took refuge in Dunyveg, where they were again besieged. Coll, finding his position hopeless, took boat by night to seek assistance, leaving the Castle in his mother's charge. Calder, who guessed his object, also determined to increase his strength, and left his troops in command of the Lady of Dunstaffnage, a bold, masculine woman. Gaelic generosity left woman to oppose woman, and the Lady of Dunstaffnage, discovering the wooden pipe that supplied the Castle with water, naturally blocked it, in consequence of which the garrison was compelled to surrender. The night of the surrender, the piper, whose profession secured the respect of the victors, recognized the 'biorlinn,' or boat of his master, Coll, on its return; and that he might prevent his falling into his enemies' hands, asked leave to play a pibroch he had just composed on the misfortune that had befallen them. His request being readily granted, he went on the battlements and began his tune. Coll was just entering the bay, and hearing the new tune, quickly took in its import, at once put about, and escaped. The enraged Lady of Dunstaffnage made the piper play his merriest tunes as he walked before her to the top of a high hill, where his fingers were cut off, that he might never more give a similar warning. This hill, the highest in Islay, is still known as 'Beinn Iainh Dhearg,' the hill of the bloody hand.

'Lord Lovat's lament' enshrines the memory of that intrepid man, who was sentenced to death, in spite of his advanced age, for participation in the rebellion of 1745. Lovat was a genuine specimen of the old chief, and kept up, on a very limited income, the ancient rites of Highland hospitality. When he was taken prisoner, he told the officer to use him well, for he would have to answer for it before men whom he would tremble to look at; and made the piper play before him on the journey. During the few weeks that intervened between his sentence and its execution, he maintained that flow of animal spirits for which he was remarkable, and even made witticisms on his approaching death. In conversation he declared that he had never been drunk, had never had a headache, and could read the smallest print without the aid of glasses. The major of the Tower asked him one morning how he did. 'Do,' says Lovat, 'why, I am about to do very well, for I am going to a place, sir, where hardly any majors and but few lieutenant-generals go.' The day before his execution he sang part of an old song; and offering his chair to the Governor, who had called, it was courteously refused. 'What,' says the old lord, 'would you have me to be unmannerly the last day of my life!' Horace's line, 'Dulce et decorum est pro patria mori,' was his last saying: one blow of the axe severed his aged head from the trunk. Just before his death, he said that he had ordered by his will that all pipers, from John o' Groat's to Edinburgh, should be invited to play before his corpse, for which they were to receive a handsome allowance; but as things were, the old women would sing the coronach for him, and there will be crying and clapping of hands, for I am one of the greatest chiefs in the Highlands.'

'Am Port Leathach,' the 'half-finished' pibroch, was so called from its having been the joint composition of Patrick of MacCrummen and his pupil, John Dall MacKay. Patrick, intending to visit MacDonald of Clanranald, then in the Island of Uist, was preparing a pibroch suitable to the occasion, and complimentary to Lady MacDonald, for which purpose he retired to his private apartment. He then began the 'urlar,' or ground-work, two parts of which he repeated many times without being able to please himself exactly with another, when MacKay, who was listening at the door unobserved, struck up a measure so well adapted to those which his master had been playing that the latter, opening the door, with delight exclaimed, 'Ah! you have done it, but it shall not bear the name I designed for it, but shall be called "the half-finished tune," as I made two parts, and you have made the other.'

The very touching lament, called 'Prince Charles's lament,' was composed by Captain Malcolm MacLeod in 1746. The Captain was an excellent piper, and is described by those who knew him as having been remarkable for his fine, muscular figure and aristocratic air. He held a commission in the Prince's Army and was instrumental in his escape, but was himself taken prisoner and carried to London. No witnesses coming forward at his trial, he was discharged, and having no means, determined to proceed to Scotland on foot. But on reaching Barnet, on the great North Road, a carriage passed in which was a lady, who, struck by his appearance, entered into conversation with him, and learning who he was, and the cause of his situation, invited him to take a seat with her and conveyed him as far as Edinburgh. His travelling companion was probably Flora MacDonald, and the post-chaise one provided by Lady Primrose. MacLeod is described as wearing a purple kilt (tartan being then prohibited) with a dark green jacket, slightly trimmed with silver lace.

'The Duke of Perth's march,' a pibroch composed by Finlay MacRae, piper to the Earl of Seaforth, was written in 1745 to commemorate the march of the Rebel Army to attack the royal forces under Sir John Cope at Prestonpans, where the Highlanders obtained so triumphant a victory. After Culloden, the Earl of Perth embarked for France, but died on the passage, 1746. Finlay the piper, with another MacRae, followed the fortunes of the white flag, and they are said to have been the only persons who went from Kintail.

The pibroch called 'The pretty dirk' was written by Patrick of MacCrummen. He showed great admiration for a dirk belonging to MacLeod, and the Laird told him that if he composed an appropriate tune in its praise it should be presented to him. Patrick wanted nothing more. Next morning he struck up the newly composed pibroch, with which the chief was much pleased, the notes expressing the piper's entreaties for the gift and his exultation in receiving it; and calling MacCrummen into the castle he handed him the weapon, saying he well deserved it for so forcible an appeal prepared in so short a space of time.

These few notes on the associations and purpose of the pibroch may serve to point in some degree the national characteristics of courage and loyalty to the chief and clan. The writer is greatly indebted to a 'Collection of ancient piobaireachd,' published by Angus MacKay in the early part of the last century.

HYMN-BOOKS AND THEIR REFORMATION.

Mr. Norman Pearson has an article in the June Nineteenth Century on 'Hymns.' Regarding them entirely from a literary point of view, he demands drastic reform in the principles of selection and exclusion, and calls upon the able poetasters of our generation to turn their hands to hymn-writing and supply some reasonable substitute for stuff which is, he thinks, unfit for the pages of a third-rate magazine. He is tired of the old Judaistic symbolism, the 'Kedar's tents,' 'Babylon's sad wave,' of the ancient evangelicals; he is equally tired of the gorgeous imagery of 'sapphire throne' and 'jasper bulwark' affected by the mystics, and wants something sensible, thoughtful, and devotional which shall meet the need of our age. Nothing, he rightly says, is so destructive of an institution as the contempt of its friends; open hostility it can survive, but disaffection among its adherents saps its foundations.

To avoid such a disaster he thinks our national hymn as it is must go, and rise again reformed and rewritten by an 'authority' which shall be not entirely clerical but largely lay. Of course authority is only another word for that universal panacea for righting wrongs—the committee; and the committee must also contain a suitable proportion of literary men (he says nothing of musicians) to insist on a proper standard of poetical diction.

We should not have quoted the article in question at such length had it not been that the views expressed there are exceedingly common in this critical age. There is scarcely any subject more freely and perpetually discussed than hymns; no form of literature more fiercely criticized, possibly with reason. The only curious fact is that the efforts which the writer describes have been made over and over again, apparently with no satisfactory result. Within the last decade hymn-book after hymn-book has appeared, selected by committees not, we believe, without literary taste, revised and enriched by the most eminent authorities, clerical, literary and musical, which we possess, and yet without any conspicuous success in avoiding the frailties which beset all such books from the point of view which this article represents.

To quote only one or two, the 'Public School Hymn Book,' the 'Oxford Hymn Book,' with its picturesque music-type, the 'English Hymnal' and 'Worship Song,' have all appeared in recent years. To say that any of these has been issued without due consideration of material would be ridiculous, and yet we doubt if any of them has really shaken in any way the traditional position of 'Ancient and Modern,' which has become almost the only real English song-book in existence. We say so deliberately. For every national ballad well known and freely sung by the people of England, we do not doubt that there are ten hymns as familiar. The fact is that it is our idiosyncrasy as a nation to prefer religious sentiment to patriotic and national feeling. Also, though this is a side-issue which must be dealt with more at length subsequently, we have no liking for characteristic rhythm, and the trite character of hymns which gives no opportunity for unexpected departures in melody suits our Anglo-Saxon commonplace better than anything else.

Therefore, while allowing the literary weakness of hymns, we say that efforts are always being made to improve them, not only by publishing new selections, but also—a more questionable practice—by revising the text of those we have. Experience seems to show that radical reform of the kind indicated is not feasible or desirable, and therefore we take up the cudgels for hymns as they are (say, in 'Ancient and Modern'), under the belief that the literary point of view, which such articles as that quoted represent, entirely fails to grasp the true significance of the points at issue. Only in one paragraph does the writer touch on what is the root of the whole matter: 'The emotion of a crowd is admittedly something more than the total isolated emotions of the individuals who compose it. . . . United song has a psychical power, an emotional magic of its own. Most of us, at some time or other, in theatre, cathedral, or procession, have bent to the sway of this strange influence, which touches the heart, fires enthusiasm, or deepens resolve, playing in subtle fashion on the hidden depths of our nature.' In fact, to put the matter plainly, 'The music's the thing'; the words are only a vehicle. Music is the power which provokes and renders possible these expressions of common feeling. It is to music alone that we owe the stirring of these hidden depths and the raising of the heart to heights of feeling for which intellectual means can find no expression. But the literary man will by no means allow this. He points to passages of great poetry; to the rhetoric of the great orator: do not they provoke a similar rapture? In a sense, yes; and when declaimed on the stage to a certain extent the same all-compelling unison of feeling. But that is due to the fact that they share in the distinctive quality of music: they also employ the physical effect of sound upon the ears which is the natural medium of music.

Take the loftiest words of Shakespeare, passages like the stupendous 'Cloud-capped towers.' It is not to the intellectual insight of the poet that they owe their inspiring power, their vistas of infinite glory, but to the music of the words. The mere collocation of sounds, acting through the associations of familiar words, is the nearest approach literature can make to the supreme power of music itself, which is to express those things which can never be put into words. How large a part is played by mere voice in the loftiest rhetoric. Newman said that he would rather hear one man read the ten commandments than listen to the most thoughtful of sermons preached by anyone else. When the musical quality is wanting, the written word must soon fall from the heights of exalted feeling into the colder atmosphere of literary enjoyment and criticism. The intellect assumes the mastery, and half-seen but wholly felt imaginations vanish within the limits of its defining power. Such words may be considered applicable only at best to what is roughly called a 'musical man.' But then high literary rapture is equally certainly confined to men of educated literary taste. Music is an exceedingly common gift, whereas a taste for literature is not. The means whereby the poet makes his chief effect has been seen to be strictly analogous to the methods of music, but to the vast majority of mankind much less obvious. Mr. Pearson quotes two poems of high poetic quality, which in his opinion ought to be included in the ideal hymn-book. They are 'Crossing the bar' and Swinburne's lines to the storm blast, beginning :

O stout north-easter,
Sea king, land waster,
For all thine haste or
Thy stormy skill,

He might have added Rudyard Kipling's Recessional, a poem which is both noble in thought and remarkable in literary expression. Now in deference to the literary point of view which Mr. Pearson presents, both this poem and Tennyson's beautiful lines have been included in some modern hymnals. We should like to know with what congregational effect as hymns. We believe that the universal verdict would be that as hymns they are impossible. Sir Frederick Bridge's setting of the second has enjoyed some popularity as an anthem, sung by solo voices, but in spite of the fame attaching to the Recessional the words will not sing. The irregularity of the metre gives occasion for those ominous little additions to the music: 'Verses 2 and 5 must commence thus —'; 'line 5 of verse 5 should run —'; modifications which are fatal to congregational singing. As for the Swinburne, it would require no small degree of courage to set it as a hymn at all, still more to attempt to impose it upon an ordinary congregation. The fact is, these poems have their own literary music and therefore will not serve as a vehicle for music pure and simple. The one is inconsistent with the other; the very irregularities which give rhythmic play to a poem become a difficulty when it is set to music; indeed, it may generally be laid down that the more musical a poem sounds when read, the worse it goes for singing purposes.

There could not be a poet whose diction is more musical than Tennyson, and he has written many songs; and yet we venture to assert that none of them have become famous in musical form, unless it be Barnby's setting of 'Sweet and low' and Balfe's 'Come into the garden, Maud.' So also it is with Shelley and Swinburne. The merest ballad jingle, the crudest rhyme of ancient chivalry is preferred before them, inasmuch that the writing of words for songs has become a special craft. Scarcely any great poets except Shakespeare, Goethe and Heine are extensively drawn upon. A song for music must be simple in sense, resonant in sound (using many open vowels), and obvious in rhythm. If these requirements keep much of the best poetry out of the song-field, how much greater the difficulty when hymns are in question; music which has to be sung by many voices and therefore requires words still more obvious in meaning and trite in rhythm. What wonder that the conditions have proved too hard to be consistent with poetry at all, and that we have had for the most part to be content with association instead. Our hymns may not be fine poems, but they are endeared to us by a thousand memories. To cut out any of the old hymns because they contain phrases which are bad poetry and even to some unsympathetic minds ridiculous nonsense, would be bad policy; to replace them wholesale by others which could not be poetically much better and which would have none of their association would be absurd.

But could not some of those old hymns be improved? It has been tried often enough, from the mere verbal alteration which made Toplady's 'Cleanse me from its guilt and power' into 'Cleanse from guilt and make me pure' to gain a better rhyme, to the entire re-writing of stanzas and interposition of new ones. Surely the literary man can hardly approve of such practices which put the character and often the sense of well-known hymns at the mercy of any casual critic. Changes may be justified on theological grounds, or, as in the familiar case 'Jesus lives; no longer now . . .' in the interest of simple people's understanding, but they would be considered an unpardonable sin in any other form of literature.

Hymns are meant to be sung. People who are singing do not reason about the meaning of the words; they are not conscious of logical inconsistencies or unpoetical diction. Even hymns which are so familiar that the words come to the lips without conscious effort of memory have never been canvassed from the point of view of logic, diction, or good sense. They are survivals from our childhood, when music and imagination occupied the mind without thought of criticism, and as such we accept them still. It is the sovereign power of association to make us able to employ anything unquestioned, until the unhappy day when reason insists upon upsetting our day-dreams. It is when the middle-aged man takes his hymn-book by accident home from church that he begins to fall foul of its language and sentiments. The music is no longer there; he forgets, if he ever noticed, how well some of those bald lines sing. He has had no experience of the dilemmas of the hymn contriver, still less idea how much many simple folk of a less ingenious turn of mind cling to those very metaphors and phrases which seem to him so trite and far-fetched in their origin. The rhymes of hymns are often very bad, their logic pitiable. What matter, if they have for years done good service as the vehicle of musical expression? Away with them! let us find something better. Unfortunately it is just these newer, better, or at any rate more literary hymns that suit their real purpose worst. 'Lead, kindly Light,' in spite of its eminently imaginative words and Dykes's popular tune, has always somehow gone on one leg in church.

Then good sense and good poetry are to go for nothing in our national hymn-books, and congregations may as well rest content with Tate and Brady at once. Not so, we welcome any innovation as long as it is an improvement, but we contend that the ultimate verdict on hymns can be given by no committee, lay or clerical, even when reinforced by distinguished literary judgment, but by the people. What they like, what suits its purpose well, survives; what does not do so soon becomes forgotten, or at least remains unsung. A bad stanza will not destroy a well-known hymn, nor will the worst of rhymes weaken the appeal of the thought of such hymns as 'Rock of Ages'; a phrase, a line, is enough to set fire to the imagination, which finds its fullest scope in the inspiring force of the massive union of voices. The heavy tread of the C.M. or L.M. tunes, as found in ancient psalmody, is more suitable for such purposes than anapaestic rhythm set to jingling 6-8 time. Surely the literary man, who professes to see merit, nay, often supreme artistic power, in poems like William Blake's, may bear with the crudities of antique devotion for the sake of the character and history which it not unfrequently holds in solution.

Nor would we discourage him from the task of trying to improve upon his models, but would only warn him that it is not by poetic power or subtle thought that his hymns will find use and acceptance, but by something beyond these great qualities, its fitness for its purpose. Is it tradition alone that prevents any of the proposed variants of the National Anthem being adopted, or do those doggerel lines represent something inherent in our English character? We are all children at bottom, and it is to the childish side of our nature, with its imagination, simplicity and quickness of feeling that the hymn, as sung, appeals. In such mood we cannot afford to be critical, and the professor who demands satisfaction for his cultivated taste must be content to go elsewhere or confine himself to the noble poetry that is to be found in places even in 'Ancient and Modern.' It is to be remembered that Palgrave, speaking on this subject in his preface to the 'Treasury of Sacred Song,' says that there is a large element of truth in the objection that 'through its general aim, and its often imperfect quality as art, sacred poetry rarely deserves the honour of that great name.'

FESTIVAL NOVELTIES.

'Summer Sports,' suite for chorus and orchestra; the poems by Samuel Daniel, Thomas Dekker, James Shirley and an anonymous writer; composed by A. Herbert Brewer. This short work will be produced at the Gloucester Festival on September 7. Dr. Brewer will, it may be hoped, earn the gratitude of his audience in thus providing them with music to a topic that suggests cheerfulness, and which as a matter of fact he has treated in a duly light and graceful style. It is true that the title might suggest cricket, Henley and lawn tennis, not to say grouse shooting, but then these forms of sport are not sufficiently antiquated to inspire the harmless, necessary poetry. So Dr. Brewer's sports are of the Arcadia and idyllic variety, in which shepherds and shepherdesses and haymakers dance and sing and play barley-break. The five numbers of the suite afford much variety of treatment. The first is for mixed voices, the next for male voices, the third for mixed voices again, the fourth for female voices, and the last, for mixed voices, to Dekker's exhilarating words. The Finale is the most elaborately worked out section of the suite: it has many dainty passages, and ends with a finely wrought-up climax. The work should be useful to choral societies on the look out for music at once lively and artistic.

'Gethsemane,' an episode from 'The Life of Christ,' for baritone solo, chorus, orchestra and organ, by Granville Bantock. This short work, although complete in itself, is, we believe, part of a large work on the life of the Saviour, upon which the composer is engaged. The words are well chosen from the Gospels by Matthew, John, Luke, and from Isaiah. An orchestral prelude in A flat, features of which are the employment of scale-passages, arpeggios, pedal notes and restraint of modulation, leads to a brief baritone recitative. This is followed by what is described as a Symphony for baritone and chorus, the sections of which are entitled, 'In the Garden,' 'The Agony,' 'The Prayer,' 'The Betrayal.' The instrumental part in this long section displays much striking novelty and significance. It throbs with rhythmic movement, and is intensely expressive. The approach of Judas at the Betrayal scene is thrillingly treated, and leads into an eight-part chorus very plainly constructed. A short solo follows, and leads to a choral Finale in eight parts, the latter section of which is very simply written over a repetition of the scales and arpeggios on the chord of A flat used in the Prelude.

'The Sun-God's Return,' cantata written by Joseph Bennett, music by Alexander Mackenzie (Op. 69). This important work will be performed at the Cardiff Festival on September 21. It was sketched many years ago, but the composer recently practically re-wrote the music, and therefore we have in the present form of the work an exemplification of his ripest style. The libretto, which is by one of the most experienced and able of librettists—one with whom Sir Alexander Mackenzie has before successfully collaborated—deals with a mythical story. Baldur, the Sun-God, is dead. He is in Hel's guest-hall, 'wordless, darkened and drooping,' 'his wine cup untasted.' Under Asgard's walls, Friga, Hermodur and warriors lament their loss. Friga calls for someone brave enough to venture to the Under-world to plead for Baldur's return. Hermodur undertakes the journey, and calls for his steed. The next scene is in Helheim, where the Queen of the Under-world sits enthroned. Hermodur rides in and makes his plea. The Queen, moved to pity, decrees that Baldur shall return when 'all things have wept for him.' This condition having been satisfied, Baldur returns, there is much rejoicing, and all nature awakes with joy at the renewal of the Sun-God's influence.

It is impossible in this brief notice of a long work to attempt to describe the composer's music. All who know Sir Alexander Mackenzie's power of construction, his skill in the handling of the orchestra and the voice, will be prepared to expect masterly treatment of the poetic and musically suggestive libretto furnished by Mr. Bennett. The music is very modern in its idioms; it displays vigour and intensity and dramatic characterization.

The scene of the arrival of Hermodur in the lower regions is a great effect, and the ensuing duet between the Queen and Hermodur exhibits the composer at his best. The chorus parts, except here and there, do not present much difficulty as modern works go. It is an advantage to the general effect of the cantata that the end is joyful, and allows the composer to adopt a glowing style.

THE IMPERIAL CHOIR.

This organization is the creation of Dr. Charles Harriss, whose zeal for the cause of imperial unity vid musical reciprocity is well known. The formation of the Imperial Choir was commenced in 1909, and it came into being during the winter of that year. The plan was to unite a number of metropolitan and suburban choral societies by providing them a special programme of music for practice and to arrange for a great combined performance in the spring of this year. The new choir therefore made its appeal not as a rival but as an inspiring objective to the existing societies. The scheme soon found favour, forty-three choral societies contributing about 4,000 chorists. Each choir was first drilled by its own conductor, then the whole choir was divided into four geographical groups and these larger sections were rehearsed by Dr. Harriss. Elaborate and laborious preparations were made for the final combined performance at the Crystal Palace on Empire Day. Bands and soloists were engaged; Lord Strathcona had a special silver medal struck for presentation to each of the 4,000 performers, and their majesties King Edward and Queen Alexandra, and the then Prince and Princess of Wales, graciously promised to honour the event with their presence. Then came the great blow, the death of King Edward. The performance was necessarily abandoned, and the situation had to be accepted with sadness. But Dr. Harriss's intense enthusiasm for the cause he had taken up was by no means chilled by the temporary frustration of his hopes. The organization of the Imperial Choir was fully maintained, and new arrangements were made for its appearance in public next spring. Meantime, as noted in our August number, Dr. Harriss is busy perfecting the arrangements for the world tour of Dr. Coward's choir.

With our present issue we give as a supplement portraits of all the conductors associated with the Imperial Choir

Church and Organ Music.

ON PSALM ACCOMPANIMENT.

There is probably no part of the Church Service which imposes a greater strain upon the true musicianship of the organist than the accompaniment of the Psalms. The qualities demanded are such, that only after many years' practice can the organist gain sufficient confidence in himself to be able, without previous consideration, to combine judicious treatment with that support for his choir which may at the time be necessary. And at the outset it may be remarked that in many cases the choir are insufficiently prepared. The actual reading of the words by the boys is in itself a work of some difficulty. To that must be added the pointing, or, in other words, the apportioning of the music of the chant to each separate verse, with such matters as intonation, quality of tone, &c. Then, at the full rehearsal, the adult members (though it is often difficult to convince them of the importance of detailed rehearsal) must be drilled, and the general result carefully considered and assured. There is some danger of the organist 'dragging' his choir through, the effect being the reverse of edifying. But supposing the choir to be independent of any instrumental support (and this should be the aim of the choirmaster), the organist must be prepared to make his accompaniment a part of a well-balanced whole. The various methods of treatment may be briefly considered. The chant, if it be played over, should be given out at the tempo at which the Psalm will be sung, and preferably without pedals, on some such combination as the choir-flutes, 8 and 4 ft., playing the simple and actual notes of the chant, without doubling or filling-in. As an example, the 25th Psalm may be sung to Sir John Goss's beautiful chant in E flat:

There is little chance for an 'organ recital' in such a Psalm, and the outlook should be a trustful contemplation of the Christian life and its sure reward. Clearly the choir have the greater responsibility in the rendering of this Psalm, while the organ part should be subdued and a mere background in the general effect.

The first two verses might be played upon the great diapasons with pedals coupled, combined with a soft swell. Pure four-part harmony is best here, and may also be employed in verses 3 and 4 on the soft Swell combination without pedals. At verse 5 the treble part would be effective if played on the Choir clarinet, the two inner parts being on the Swell, and the bass on the soft Pedal 16 coupled to Swell. Verse 6 calls for a change, and an effective treatment would be as follows:

Verses 7 and 8 would do well on the Choir flutes, 8 and 4 ft., without pedals.

A single stop, such as the Great wald flute (uncoupled), or a kindred stop, would be in keeping with verses 9 and 10. For verses 11 and 12, the following would be suitable:

During verses 13 and 14, the Swell diapason and oboe, with soft Pedal 16 coupled would do. The four following verses might be unaccompanied, while the hopeful character of the next two verses would be well illustrated by the following:

Verse 21 (to the second part of the chant) might be given on all but the full Swell (say, full to corneopane without mixture). The pedals might also, for this verse, be coupled to the Great in addition, with the diapasons drawn on that manual. In passing, it may be said that this custom probably originated at a time when the maintaining of the wind supply was a serious matter. Thus, when extra wind would be required for the Gloria, the coupling of the pedals to Great was intended as a warning to the blower or blowers to be in readiness. In any case the effect is often legitimate enough.

The Gloria to the Psalm under discussion may be accompanied on the Great diapasons and principal, coupled to Swell, with corneopane or horn.

SAMUEL SEBASTIAN WESLEY COMMEMORATIONS.

The music of Samuel Sebastian Wesley has for many years played an important part in the service lists of the stately old Cathedral of Ripon, and it was fitting that on Sunday, August 14, the centenary of his birth, he should be honoured by the mother Church of the great diocese in which he laboured from 1842 to 1849, during which period he composed the majestic canticle settings in the key of E. The morning service was the composer's Cathedral setting in F, and the anthem 'My voice shalt thou hear' (from 'Praise the Lord'). The nave of Ripon Cathedral, 94 feet from pavement to vault, and 88 feet between the walls, is one of the most resonant in England, and peculiarly adapted for giving full value to those broad effects in which Wesley's music abounds. The sermon was preached by the Lord Bishop of Ripon, who paid eloquent tribute to the most gifted church composer since Henry Purcell. The evening anthem was 'Blessed be the God and Father,' superbly sung by the combined Cathedral and voluntary choirs. At the request of Mr. C. H. Moody, Dr. J. Kendrick Pyne, an old pupil of the composer, accompanied the services, which were attended by large congregations.

On Monday evening Mr. Moody gave a complimentary dinner at the Unicorn Hotel. Proposing the toast of 'The memory of Samuel Sebastian Wesley,' Dr. Pyne spoke at considerable length on the personality and life-work of the Wesley family. The Rev. F. G. Wesley, responding, gave a number of interesting reminiscences of his distinguished father, who had at last, he said, come into his own. The Bishop of Knaresborough, himself an accomplished musician, eulogised the work of the Ripon choir, which 'always sang Wesley's music intelligently and in the right spirit.'

On Tuesday, August 16, the whole of the music at Mattins and Evensong was from the pen of S. S. Wesley, whose fine services in E, as well as 'Ascribe' (morning) and 'The Wilderness' (evening) was included. Dr. Pyne again accompanied, and at the close of the festival spoke in eulogistic terms of the work of the choir, which he asserted had sung Wesley's music with a verve and fluency he had never heard excelled.

In the evening Dr. Pyne gave a recital in the Cathedral of organ music by Samuel, Charles, and Samuel Sebastian Wesley. The nave was filled by a vast congregation. The following was the programme:

Introduction and Variations from a Concerto	Samuel Wesley. (1766-1837)
Fuga in the Ancient Style	S. Wesley.
Musette for Christmas-tide	Charles Wesley. (1757-1834)
Military March	Samuel Wesley. (Composed between the age of seven and eight.)
Offertory hymn—'The Church's one Foundation.'
Sung to Dr. S. S. Wesley's tune 'Aurelia.' Composed at Winchester for 'Jerusalem the Golden.'
Andante in F major	Samuel Sebastian Wesley.
Choral Song and Fugue	S. S. Wesley.
Adagio Concertante in A minor (Posthumous)	S. S. Wesley.
a. Air varied in F sharp minor	S. S. Wesley.
b. Grand Study in C sharp minor	S. S. Wesley.
The 'Holsworthy Church Bells' (Posthumous)	S. S. Wesley.
Finale from the Concerto in A major	S. Wesley.

The Wesley centenary was also commemorated on August 14 in Exeter Cathedral, of which Dr. Wesley was organist for seven years, by services, the music of which was selected entirely from the great composer's works. In the early morning a beautiful wreath was placed on his grave by the organists of the city. In the form of a harp, it bore the inscription 'In honoured memory. A small tribute to great genius, from Exeter organists. August 14, 1910.' On the tomb was also placed a laurel wreath. At the morning service the voluntary was the Larghetto in F minor, while the Venite and Psalms were sung to chants by Dr. Wesley. The Te Deum and Jubilate were given to the setting in F. The anthem was 'O Lord, my God,' while the fine Kyrie and Credo in E completed the service. The concluding voluntary was the Andante in F. The afternoon service was preceded by the Andante in G, the Psalm being again taken to chants by Dr. Wesley, and the Canticles to the splendid setting in E. The anthem was 'Ascribe unto the Lord.' During the collection, the Larghetto in F sharp minor was played. The hymn was sung to the tune 'Patmos,' the service concluding with the Introduction and Fugue in C sharp minor. The evening service consisted of chants and hymns, and during the collection the Andante in E minor was given. The concluding voluntaries were Andante Cantabile in G, air, 'Holsworthy Church bells,' and Choral song and Fugue in C. Dr. D. J. Wood played the organ with the greatest taste and judgment.

At St. Bees Priory Church the whole of the music at both services on August 14, except the Responses and the Litany (which were sung to Tallis's Festival setting), was selected from Wesley's works. Included were six fine chants, and the well-known original hymn-tunes 'Aurelia,' 'Harewood' and 'Alleluia.' In addition, there was an appropriate setting of 'Lead, kindly Light.' From the congregational point of view, perhaps the most interesting feature of all was the unisonal singing of such stately, traditional tunes as 'London New' and 'Hanover' to Wesley's magnificent organ accompaniments in free style. The anthems were 'Lead me, Lord' and 'Thou wilt keep him,' and the service was the dignified setting in F major. The organ voluntaries were the Larghetto in F sharp minor and a fine study on the 100th Psalm. The music throughout reflected the greatest credit on the choir, who entered into the project with much enthusiasm, and on Mr. F. J. Livesey, the organist, who devoted much time and labour to research, in order to obtain suitable music.

An organ recital was given on Sunday evening, August 14, at St. Michael's Church, Exeter, by Mr. F. J. Pinn. The church contains a memorial window to Dr. Wesley.

On Sunday, August 7, at the conclusion of the service in the Private Chapel at Buckingham Palace, Her Majesty Queen Alexandra graciously received Dr. W. G. Alcock, with the Gentlemen and Children of the Chapels Royal. To Dr. Alcock and each of the boys Her Majesty presented a handsome gold watch, inscribed with the initials E. R. intertwined, surmounted by a crown, each of the Gentlemen receiving from Her Majesty a signed photograph of herself, standing by the late King. The Queen expressed to Dr. Alcock her appreciation of the manner in which the music was rendered at the many services which Her Majesty had attended, particularly during the few weeks following the death of King Edward. The presentation was quite unexpected, and will remain a memorable occasion during a time of great historical interest.

For a fortnight during August, service was sung in Manchester Cathedral by boys' voices only; this is quite an innovation here. Versicles and Responses naturally were completely re-arranged, and new settings of the Litany and Canticles brought into use.

The annual festival of St. Margaret's College, East Grinstead, was held on July 20. The Holy Eucharist, the chief service of the day, was attended by a large congregation of clergy and laity. The Sisterhood choir sang the musical portion of the Mass to an adaptation from the Mechlin Graduale. The professor of the College, Mr. J. J. Marsh, organist of All Saints', Roffey, who has been closely associated with the work of the Solesmes Fathers, presided at the organ, and his beautiful accompaniments, combined with the excellent singing of the choir, were much appreciated.

A reprint of 'A Choral Service comprising the Ancient Plain Chant and Daily Choral Use of the Cathedral Church of Chichester' has reached us, and we have perused it with much interest. It was published about 1840, by Thomas Bennett, organist of the cathedral, 1803-1848, and the new issue is edited by the precentor (the Rev. J. H. Mee) and the organist (Mr. F. J. W. Crowe). An interesting feature is the priest's part, and there are besides other points worthy of attention, among which may be mentioned the response:

The consecutives in the following do not offend us, and even if the crochet A were omitted, it would be mentally added by the listener:

We are not quite sure of the wisdom of changing the key-signature in the earlier part, and should have preferred the Sentences, Exhortation, &c., on F instead of G. These varied traditions of our cathedrals always interest us, and we hope they will be guarded jealously by those entrusted with them.

A masterly criticism of the 'Historical edition' of 'Hymns Ancient and Modern' (edited by the Rev. W. H. Frere) appears in the Liverpool Daily Post for August 8, which should be read by all who set store by the associations inseparable from the hymn. The writer says, with much truth, 'only those that are hopelessly lost in cynicism will deny all interest in the hymns of the Christian Church.' The making of hymns is traced by Mr. Frere back to the time of St. Paul, and it is impossible to study the work without arriving at the conviction that the greatest care is necessary to preserve this form of public worship from all contaminating influences, a danger of which is, to say the least, just possible to-day. The fine work is published by William Clowes & Sons. It was reviewed in our columns in February last.

In our account of the organ recital given at St. James's Church, Whitehaven, by Mr. Wilson Foster, organist of St. Nicholas Church in that town, we wrongly described the St. James's organ as having been built by Messrs. Harrison & Harrison. The builders of the fine instrument at St. James's are Messrs. Norman & Beard, and we much regret our error.

We understand that the organ in St. Helen's, Bishopsgate, is to be restored by the Merchant Taylors' Company, as a memorial of the late Rev. J. A. L. Airey, who did so much to maintain the high excellence of the music at St. Helen's.

Mr. Edwin H. Lemare has returned to England after his visit to the United States. He will give six organ recitals at Nottingham, one of them, on October 8, at the Albert Hall. He has also accepted a number of other engagements in the North of England.

The fine organ by Father Willis, which has been in the Hampstead Conservatoire Concert Hall for over twenty years, has been purchased by the Rev. Canon Hoskyns, at St. Peter's Parish Church, Brighton, where it is now in course of erection. The specification of the organ as originally erected at the Conservatoire is as follows:

PEDAL ORGAN (CCC to F).

Reviews.

Six Short Pieces for the Organ. By John E. West.
 [Novello & Co., Ltd.]

The six pieces under notice originally appeared in the 'Village Organist,' and have since been issued separately from that collection.

Mr. West deserves the thanks of those organists to whom the true traditions of the organ and its music are still of value. We are in some danger of losing these traditions, by reason of the development of the instrument on orchestral lines, and the consequent temptation to composers to produce music of the orchestral type, in which stops of an imitative character predominate, to the frequent exclusion of those more characteristic of the organ.

We suppose every composer has a right to his 'idiom,' and we find Mr. West to be no exception to this. In four of the six pieces before us he employs triple time, and in each case the rhythmic form of the initial subject consists of a crotchet followed by a minim. We do not cavil at this, but point it out as a matter of interest.

The Allegro Pomposo would serve its purpose well as an effective concluding voluntary, while it makes small demands upon the performer and the scope of his instrument.

The meditation entitled 'Easter Morn,' if reminiscent of Sir John Stainer's style of introductory voluntary, is naturally none the less excellent, and we commend it as a good example of a simple theme artistically treated.

No. 3 is a Prelude on the Funeral Hymn 'Now the labourer's task is o'er,' and the quiet, contemplative character of the piece entitles it to a place in the yet meagre selection of music suitable to such an occasion as a funeral.

The 'Harvest Song,' intended as a concluding voluntary, demands some skill in phrasing, while the actual technical difficulties are otherwise moderate.

The 'Impromptu' (No. 5) is an example of a simple and withal well-written introductory voluntary.

Mr. West has succeeded in producing a 'Passacaglia' (No. 6) of small scope, while he has at the same time secured interest and variety, offering little difficulty in performance. The piece would serve well as a concluding voluntary, or, if coupled with another contrasted piece, might be given at a recital.

The series is the work of a cultured musician, and we cordially recommend it, not only to those whose opportunities are limited by the capacity of their instruments, but to the fortunate possessors of more adequate means of expression.

Science and Singing. By E. G. White.

[The Vincent Music Co., Ltd.]

The perennial interest which attaches to the problems of the physiology of voice use is well illustrated in this book. The author's object may be stated in his own words: 'The whole burden of this book is to show that the vocal cords are not, and cannot be, voice or sound producers.' Although the object is thus negatively stated, the greater part of the book is intended to prove that tone is positively produced by vibrations of the air within the sinuses of the head.

These premises necessitate the entire abrogation of the current theory of the registers of the voice, and a new theory is enunciated, viz., that each of the three registers recognised by the author is caused by vibrations in a particular sinus or set of sinuses. The value of the book depends, therefore, upon the cogency of the arguments which are brought forward to explain the new theories.

We freely acknowledge our admiration of the research which the author has put into the anatomical side of the subject, and the pains he has taken to illustrate his doctrines in a series of excellently executed photographic reproductions, but we as greatly regret that he has accepted mere probabilities as proofs, and drawn conclusions from analogies, and bad analogies at that, which are calculated to misguide many who are not experts. We have carefully searched for the statement of convincing proofs, but we find nothing which can compare with the generally accepted views which Mr. White aims to supplant. He makes strong assertions with the utmost confidence, and yet admits in other places of doubts which nullify any justification for the confidence he exhibits. More than this, he contradicts his statement on p. 9, in which he says: 'I now know and teach that the vocal cords are not sound-producers at all,' whilst on p. 54, referring to the same matter, he says: 'I would not like to make such a positive statement . . . it may be possible for the vocal cords to produce sound.' The italics are ours.

We now consider the crux of the matter. On p. 20 Mr. White says: 'The idea of vocal cord vibrations has for generations been accepted as a truism, and men have not taken the trouble to stop and consider whether the path laid out for them by previous masters is right or wrong.' Such a statement surely shows that Mr. White himself has promulgated his iconoclastic theories without previously taking 'the trouble to stop and consider' the results of investigations made by eminent authorities, who certainly have taken immense pains to ascertain whether or not vocal-cord vibration and resultant tone-production are facts.

In 1866 were published detailed records of experiments performed by Dr. Wyllie, of Edinburgh, for the purpose of definitely ascertaining the functions and capabilities of the vocal cords. These records were also re-issued in his 'Physiology of the Larynx,' and the experiments have been referred to in a number of standard works on the voice, particularly in those by the late Charles Lunn; and yet, in spite of several quotations from the latter author, Mr. White makes no attempt to deal with facts so fatal to his theories!

The results of those and similar experiments have been accepted by the medical profession and by voice-training authorities, as proving irrefutably that vocal tone and variations of pitch are due to the vibrations of the vocal cords, and upon this foundation of scientific investigation rests the 'truism' objected to by Mr. White.

Mr. White claims that his principles are going to prove 'of great benefit to the human race. By means of further work and thought on these lines, I am quite convinced that dumbness and the deafness which accompanies it will presently be a thing of the past.'

We venture to say that this statement is another example of the want of knowledge which characterizes the book. Is it possible that Mr. White does not know that the cure of such dumbness is a fait accompli, and that there are schools expressly for the cure and education of deaf mutes? The articulation of the single letter B affords a complete refutation of his main theory contained in 'Science and singing.'

In spite of the author's confident assertion that 'no one can say that the theories are unscientific or impossible,' we are forced to conclude that whether Mr. White's be considered from the acoustical, physiological, or even the pathological standpoint, no other terms could more suitably or justly describe them.

Second Suite for the Pianoforte. First Ballade for the Pianoforte. Composed by York Bowen.

[Novello : Avison Edition.]

Few of our young composers have as fluent and romantic an imagination as Mr. York Bowen, and still fewer have his ability to dispense with the aid of orchestral colour in giving point to their ideas. The monochromatic tones of the pianoforte, which are a barren field to the inexperienced modern composer, are employed by Mr. Bowen in the above works without any sacrifice of picturesque effect. The Suite is in four movements. The opening Prelude is mainly built upon one significant and arresting musical idea, and its style is akin to that of the old-time Toccata. The Intermezzo is a long stream of pure melody wrapped round with ingenious harmonies. Then follows a Barcarolle, similarly melodious. The final movement, entitled 'A romp,' is an exhilarating piece, and hugely effective. From beginning to end of the Suite the interest never flags. Mr. Bowen's individual harmonies are themselves sufficient to keep it alive. A chord of the augmented eleventh (described by Mr. Frederick Corder in the Musical Times for December, 1909, as the 'favourite modern chord') appears in many guises, often in its outlandish second inversion. In the Barcarolle tonic triads and dominant sevenths rarely appear without a submediant attached. Such devices and mannerisms are employed, however, only to decorate a solid sub-structure and not to disguise its absence. The melodies and the design of the pieces are excellent, and the basis of the harmonic system diatonic.

The Ballade is of less concentrated interest than the Suite. It contains some broad and brilliant passage-work between varied statements of a principal theme, and can be made highly effective in the hands of a capable executant. The 'favourite' chord is not neglected; of the other harmonic peculiarity described above the following is a typical instance:

The composer of these works is a pianist of brilliant technical powers; yet the care he has taken in the 'laying-out' of his music shows his practical sympathy for the less proficient player.

Songs. By Charles Kennedy Scott. Words by various authors.

[Breitkopf & Härtel.]

The first aim of the composer of these songs is to find adequate and beautiful musical expression for the meaning and spirit of the poems. In his quest he pursues paths of his own choosing, which at times lead merely to the abnormal, but more often reveal an attractive individuality. He achieves his effects usually by harmonic means, and always heightens the interest of his songs through the medium of the accompaniment. In the latter respect he avoids the common error of purposeless elaboration. 'Three songs for high voice' (Beatrice E. Bulman) comprise 'Soul seasons,' a highly expressive song slightly marred by peculiarities of accentuation, 'Spring rapture' and 'Finis.' 'To Joyce' and 'Dream quest' (Laurence Housman), for tenor or high baritone, are published in one cover; the latter contains some striking and forceful ideas. Of similar range is the melodious 'She walks in beauty' (Byron). 'A sea dirge,' for low voice, is a remarkable impressionistic setting of Shakespeare's 'Full fathom five.' 'A lullaby' (A. M. Lucas), for mezzo-soprano or contralto, has undeniable charm, but approaches the conventional. Two fairy songs for soprano, 'The lost fairy' and 'A wish' (Beatrice E. Bulman), have a simple, ingenuous vocal part and a light fantastic accompaniment. The words of 'The child and the clouds' are by the same author; the music is of striking, if not completely spontaneous, originality.

Love wakes. An analogy. The mad dog. Hang fear, cast away care. That very wise man. Orpheus. Part-songs for male voices. Composed by C. Hubert H. Parry. Words by various authors.

[Novello & Co., Ltd.]

Sir Hubert Parry is assiduous in his attention to the needs of choral societies and quartet parties to whom knotty problems of execution are not an end. In these part-songs he works both his serious and his humorous veins for their benefit. From the former source comes his smooth and melodious setting of Scott's verses, beginning with 'Love wakes and weeps while Beauty sleeps.' Similar characteristics are shown in the music of 'An analogy,' the words of which are a poetically expressed comparison between the evening of a man's daily toil and the evening of a man's life. Goldsmith's 'The mad dog' gains much in humorous point from its present musical setting, in which simplicity and effectiveness form a rare combination of virtues. 'Hang fear, cast away care' adds to its verbal exhortation the persuasive power of a swinging rhythm. 'Æsop is 'That very wise man,' and Dickens the versifier who appeals to his authority in favour of an occasional tittle; the music vies with the sentiment in its appeal to popular favour. That 'Orpheus was a man of note' is doubly incontestable. The author of the description is Sir Hubert Parry himself, who, in the last part-song in the above list, is poet and composer in one. He proceeds to hint that in an important particular the famous musician resembled Mrs. Harris. The reassuring remark that 'The world will know there's an Orpheus now, and no mistake this time,' is set to music that gives plenty of scope for modern rivals of the ancient bard to prove their claim.

All the above part-songs are for alto lead. They are dedicated to the Gloucester Orpheus Society.

Pianoforte Works. By F. della Sudda.

[Ries & Erler, Berlin.]

The composer of these short pieces for the pianoforte is evidently an earnest-minded musician of individual views and aspirations. The thought and care which he has expended in the harmonizing of his melodies and the varying of his rhythms reveal a true artistic sense. A 'Mazurka' and 'Mazurka-Caprice' are published together. Both are elegant and fanciful, and reveal some power of thematic development. A second book contains a charming 'Wiegenliedchen,' a highly emotional slow movement entitled 'Resignation,' and a short 'Ballade' of considerable originality. No piece in this collection presents any considerable technical difficulty.

A successful performance of Coleridge-Taylor's 'Hiawatha' trilogy was given on July 1 by the Wellington (N.Z.) Musical Union, under the direction of Mr. Robert Parker. The work has been heard here on several occasions since its introduction in 1903, but that its popularity is quite unimpaired was shown by the large audience which assembled in the Town Hall on the present occasion. The soloists were Mrs. Hudson, Mr. Charles H. Stephens and Mr. Barry Coney. They, as well as the band and choir, entered heartily into the spirit of the different scenes, with the result that the picturesque music made its usual marked impression.

Correspondence.

DR. ARNE'S RELIGION.

TO THE EDITOR OF 'THE MUSICAL TIMES.'

DEAR SIR,—I am afraid that my article in your June number must have been rather badly worded if Dr. Grattan Flood can see in it any corroboration of his statement that Dr. Arne acted as organist of the Sardinian Chapel in Lincoln's Inn Fields. There is nothing as to this in Mawhood's diary, and considering how good a Catholic and how enthusiastic an amateur Mr. Mawhood was, one would naturally expect to find it mentioned if Arne had held the post of organist at the Sardinian Chapel during the period (from 1764) covered by the diary. But Dr. Grattan Flood apparently has some new source of information about Arne. His detailed account of the death-bed recantation and reception back into the church by Father Peter Browne has, so far as I know, not previously appeared in print. The Rev. John Kirk's 'Biographies of English Catholics in the eighteenth century,' indeed, states that Father Browne, in 1778, received the Rev. George Chamberlayne, but it says nothing about his having performed a similar office to Arne. Dr. Flood would therefore be doing a kindness to reveal the source of his information.

As to Arne's will having been made in order to avoid the penalties under which Catholics laboured, I have always understood that the inability to bequeath only applied to real property, and what Arne left to his wife and son consisted in personality of the smallest value. But as to this I write subject to correction, and Dr. Flood probably can inform your readers what the law exactly was in 1777.

I notice that my article needs correction in one point. Francis Barthélemon was married to Mary Young, who was a niece (not a sister) of Mrs. Arne's.—Your obedient servant,

WM. BARCLAY SQUIRE.

THE ART OF THE ORGAN PROGRAMME.

TO THE EDITOR OF 'THE MUSICAL TIMES.'

SIR,—As a humble student of the King of Instruments and also a recitalist in a small way, I should like to take exception to a considerable amount of what Mr. Grew says in his interesting article on the Art of the Organ Programme (July number, p. 436).

I do not agree that the average programme is inartistic in its construction; but I mainly take exception to Mr. Grew's idea as to how programmes should be arranged, and venture to think that if his suggestions were carried out, they would have the effect of alienating the musical (as well as the unmusical) public from the none too well patronised organ recital. He says that 'changes must only be partial,' and regards 'unity' as the thing to be borne in mind. Although agreeing that there should be unity in the sense that every item should be of the highest class of music, I submit that variety is the secret of an artistic (and attractive) organ programme.

Mr. Grew opines that many organists neglect the higher branches of their art for the shallower details of displaying their agility and the variety of the resources of their wonderful instrument. What does he mean by this? If he refers to second-rate compositions and works totally unsuitable for organ performance, I am with him; but if he means some of the modern magnificent organ music and transcriptions, I fail to see that, if these are artistically played, he has anything to complain of. Surely he has admiration for fine organ technique, clever registration and stop control. He also thinks that the organ is an impersonal instrument; but is this quite consistent in the light of his previous remarks in reference to registration, &c.? The personality of the player is very forcibly demonstrated to me at recitals I attend every week in town, given by various performers on the same organ.

Why should not Lemare's dainty Andantino be placed after a Bach item? I have heard Mr. Lemare himself play Bairstow's Scherzo after the Toccata in F.

I have also heard another fine performer play Tchaikovsky's 'Romance sans paroles' in F immediately after Guilman's Funeral March and 'Hymn of Seraphs,' and, to me, it was a pleasing contrast, as against (as I presume Mr. Grew would have it), say, a Choral Prelude of Bach.

Neither do I think it is a question whether Lemare's Romance in D flat is a companion piece to Bach's Toccata in F or not. We do not always adhere to the principle of putting like with like. Supposing the movements of the great symphonies and sonatas of Beethoven were constructed on the 'unity' as against the 'contrast' principle, would they be so enjoyable? That is mistaking uniformity and monotony for unity. I think that the beautiful Romance in D flat is a well-contrasted piece to be set against the glorious Toccata in F. And because a piece of a lighter character precedes or succeeds a very important Bach item, it does not necessarily infer that the latter will be played half-heartedly, as Mr. Grew seems to suggest. I should rather imagine the reverse would be the case, as, if it were not for variety, our lives would hardly be worth the living.

Then he praises the programme starting with Guilman's Grand Chœur in D, followed by the overture to the 'Messiah.' To my mind, this is monotony itself. Surely a piece of a particularly subdued character (preferably one of the cantabile type) would best follow Guilman's Grand Chœur. And apart from this, although I am a fervent admirer of Handel, I do not think the overture to the 'Messiah' is a suitable recital item, although quite admissible as a church voluntary.

Then he eulogises the placing together of Mendelssohn's Sonata No. 3 and Franck's Prelude, Fugue and Variation, both of which are very fine, but nevertheless essentially erudite works, thus tending to monotony. Following this come Chauvet's 'Les Cloches' and Rheinberger's 'Visione,' both in the same key, thereby starting with two pieces of the same style, and proceeding in a similar manner. He would also have, in one programme, no less than three pieces by one composer, namely, the Prelude and Fugue in D minor and the Passacaglia in C minor, besides an Aria of Bach, two of which, at least, are in minor keys, whilst the Passacaglia finishes with a fugue. And yet another fugue is thrown in, by Liszt. Has he not lost sight of the fact that, to some, the appreciation of many of the superb organ works is an acquired taste, and that giving too large a dose at a time is not likely to increase such appreciation? Three fugues in one recital would get on one's nerves.

But ideal organ programmes, to my way of thinking, are to be found in those provided at recitals given by an ideal organist, whose playing I was pleased to see your valuable paper praised so highly recently. The programmes always show a great amount of forethought, there being no monotony of key, style, time taken to perform, &c., but everything beautifully contrasted.

Programmes on such lines as these, admitting of latitude and variety, yet every piece of the highest class, constitute, in my humble opinion, ideals in the organ recital programme.

Yours, &c.,

Cricklewood.

Obituary.

We regret to record the following deaths:

JOHAN SELMER, the Norwegian composer, at Venice, on July 21. Born at Christiania on January 20, 1844, he already during his school days was much interested in music. Though destined by his parents for a lawyer's career, he soon decided to take up the study of music professionally. He went to Paris, and entered Ambroise Thomas's class for composition at the Conservatoire. The young artist's stay in the French capital came, however, to a sudden end in 1871, when, on the termination of the Commune, he was obliged to flee the country on account of the active part he had taken in the insurrectionary movement. He then resumed his studies at Leipsic under E. F. Richter. When, in 1874, he returned to his native city, his compositions aroused considerable attention, and in a few years he was honoured by the Storching, which voted him an annual pension. In 1883 he was appointed conductor of Christiania Kunstforening in succession to Johan Svendsen, a post which he held for some years. The latter part of his life he spent mostly abroad. Selmer wrote many interesting compositions, including the choral works 'Nordens Aand' and 'Hilsen til Nidaros,' and several orchestral works. He was also a prolific composer of songs.

MADAME DELPHINE UGALDE, at Paris, on July 18. Born in Paris on December 3, 1829, she made her debut at the Opéra Comique in July, 1848, in Auber's 'Domino noir.' She created the leading parts in many works, including Ambroise Thomas's 'Psyche' and 'Le Songe d'une Nuit d'Été,' and Offenbach's 'Galathée,' in which rôle she achieved great success. In the sixties, she for a short time managed the 'Bouffes-Parisiens' Operetta Theatre.

At San Francisco, Mr. WRAY TAYLOR, aged fifty-six, a well-known organist. Mr. Taylor was a native of Lincoln, but left that city early in life. He was appointed organist of St. Mary's Cathedral, Honolulu, and subsequently became organist of All Saints' Church, and St. Paul's Church, San Francisco, retaining the latter position until shortly before his death.

EMILIO USIGLIO, at Milan. He was born at Parma on January 8, 1841, and in 1861 made his debut as an operatic composer in Turin with a four-act opéra-buffa 'La Locandiera.' He achieved his greatest success in 1868 with another comic opera, 'Le Edurante di Sorrento,' which was played all over Italy and still occupies a place in Italian répertoires.

Königlicher Musikdirector AUGUST TRENKLER, at Dresden, on August 1, in his seventy-fifth year. The deceased founded, and for many years acted as conductor of, the well-known Dresdener Gewerbehaukapelle.

HENRY HEYMANN, director of Messrs. Metzler & Co., on July 8. He left an estate of the gross value of £32,627.

'A SUMMER NIGHT.'

OPERA, BY G. H. CLUTSAM.

This opera was produced by Mr. Beecham at His Majesty's Theatre, on July 23, too late for notice in our last issue. In many respects this was the most notable performance of the whole Beecham autumn season, because it brought forward the only new work by an English composer. The new opera is short, and has only one act. Mr. Clutsum is his own librettist, and he has based his lively story upon one of the tales of the Heptameron. There are five characters and no chorus. The plot is not conspicuously edifying, but it allows of much comedy, and, as written by Mr. Clutsum, is full of incident. The details are too lengthy to recount here. It must suffice to say that the story turns upon a flirtation, and mistaken identity which just escapes troublesome consequences. As to the music, we are disposed to give it, on a first hearing, almost unreserved praise for its melodiousness, fluency and appropriateness. The accompaniments have constant interest, and show that Mr. Clutsum has a keen orchestral sense. The song 'Madonna mia,' sung by Lisa, is a gem of its kind, and the Finale 'Ah! come, beloved' displays mastery of effect. Mr. Clutsum is modern enough to include some interesting experiments with the whole-tone scale. In this connection it is just to mention that the opera was composed in 1904.

The performance under Mr. Beecham's own direction was an excellent one from the musical point of view, but the acting, more especially of the humorous parts, rather hung fire. Miss Beatrice la Palme was a conspicuous success, as indeed she was throughout the season in all the parts she undertook to interpret. The cast was as follows:

Lisa	Beatrice la Palme
Lucretia	Muriel Terry
Toni	Walter Hyde
Messer Niccolo	Harry Dearth
Messer Facio	Lewys James

A performance of Mozart's charming farcical operetta 'Der Schauspieldirektor' (The Impresario) was given on the same evening. It was most humorously and cleverly interpreted by some of the best members of Mr. Beecham's company. Such a piece, acted and sung as it was on this occasion, would be a serious rival to modern comedy opera if produced for a run. The English version used was a very witty one by Mr. Alfred Kalisch. Mr. Cuthbert Hawley conducted.

OPERATIC PROJECTS.

THE BEECHAM SEASON.

The operas that Mr. Beecham will produce during his Autumn season at Covent Garden, commencing on October 1, are to be selected from a long list in which the following are included:

Tiefland	d'Albert.
Elektra; Salome; Guntram	Richard Strauss.
Hamlet	Ambroise Thomas.
Fidelio	Beethoven.
Tristan and Isolde; Die Meistersinger	Wagner.
Ariane et Barbe-bleu	Dukas.
Pique-Dame	Tchaikovsky.
Dylan	Holbrooke.
Koanga	Delius.
Le Chemineau	Leroux.
The Bartered Bride	Smetana.
A Summer Night	Clutsum.
The Magic Flute	Mozart.
Falstaff	Verdi.
Les Troyens	Berlioz.
Manon	Massenet.
Romeo and Juliet	Gounod.

The production of 'Salome' is dependent upon the permission of the Censor.

The conductors will be Mr. Beecham, Mr. Percy Pitt, Mr. Cuthbert Hawley, Mr. Alfred Hertz and Signor Camilieri.

Mr. Beecham has also organized a provincial tour of his operatic company and an orchestra as a continuation of the successful season held at His Majesty's Theatre this summer. The following towns will be visited in order: Blackpool, Dublin, Belfast, Manchester, Glasgow, Edinburgh, Liverpool, Newcastle, Leeds, Nottingham, Birmingham, Brighton; from September 26 to October 8 the company will be at the Kennington Theatre. Mr. Beecham, Mr. Hamish McCunn and Mr. Howard Carr will be the conductors. The season will open on September 5 and continue till December 17.

ITALIAN OPERA.

On September 1 a season of Italian opera-comique will open at the Kingsway Theatre, under the management of Signor de Macchi in connection with Colonel Mapleson. Rossini's 'Il Barbiere' will be performed on the opening night under Signor de Macchi's direction.

OPERA AT THE SAVOY.

A second season of opera has been arranged by Miss Marie Brema to be given at the Savoy Theatre, on lines similar to those which made her recent productions of Gluck's 'Orpheus' so successful. Miss Brema contemplates producing an opera by Handel and a new work by Emmanuel Moor.

THE PROMENADE CONCERTS.

The short period of musical quiescence in London came to an end on August 13, when this remarkable series of concerts entered upon its sixteenth season. The programmes again possess the high standard of interest maintained in previous years. It is not every concert, of course, that will attract the jaded professional musician to whom hackneyed works have lost their savour. The programmes are chosen on an essentially popular basis, and established favourites take a prominent place in the list: thus the 'Tannhäuser' overture is down for seven performances, the '1812' and 'Meistersinger' overtures and the 'Peer Gynt' suite for six each, the 'Rienzi' overture for five, Sibelius's 'Finlandia' and Jarnefeldt's 'Preludium' for four each, the 'Midsummer-night's Dream' overture and 'Casse Noisette' suite for three each, and so on. Monday evenings are, as usual, devoted to Wagner, and on Friday evenings Beethoven's Symphonies are again to be performed in chronological order (the choral portion being omitted from the ninth). No symphony by Schumann is included. For those in search of new sensations there is abundant unfamiliar music by familiar composers, and a large list of novelties, as set forth in our last issue.

On the opening night a crowded audience listened to a popular programme, of which Elgar's 'Cockaigne' overture was the principal feature. On August 16 the work of chief interest was Strauss's 'Don Quixote,' which is to be repeated on September 22. On August 18, Mr. Easthope Martin's two Eastern dances for orchestra, named 'Egyptian bell dance' and 'Snake dance,' were performed for the first time and were favourably received. The means by which the composer's quasi-Eastern effects were secured were not of striking originality, but they were effective, and the same may be said of the scoring in general. On August 23, Mr. York Bowen showed great enthusiasm in playing the solo part of his own Pianoforte concerto in E flat.

THE STRATFORD-ON-AVON FESTIVAL.

For many years a more or less important function in honour of Shakespeare has been held annually at Stratford-on-Avon.

The building of the Memorial Theatre some thirty odd years ago gave these functions a form and an influence that a public dinner and speechmaking could not effect. The Stratford festivals have been growing in strength and interest annually, and the one that has just concluded its three weeks' run (July 25 to August 13) has taken a wider scope than anything previous.

Mr. F. R. Benson (on whom the Freedom of the town, as in the case of Garrick, has been conferred), with his company, gave an exceptionally excellent Shakespearean series, and produced (on July 26) the prize play 'The Piper,' by Josephine Preston Peabody (Mrs. Lionel Marks). Mr. Benson was the Piper and Miss Marion Terry, Veronika. It need scarcely be said that the play has Browning's poem for its foundation, though considerable liberty was taken with the secondary and with the final part of this story. The very pretty music has been written by Mr. Christopher Wilson.

Three concerts have been held under the direction of Mr. and Mrs. Albert Mallinson, two being entirely of Mr. Mallinson's compositions, and one (August 5) devoted to works by different composers. Miss Ada Crossley sang at the last of these concerts.

A popular feature of the festival has been the Morris dances. Having in view the growing interest in this form of dancing, the committee of the Association invited competitors from the schools, not only of the district but from more distant parts, to give displays. Mrs. Tuke, Mr. Clive Carey and Mr. Frank Kidson were asked to give judgment, and certificates of merit were distributed to the best competing teams. It had been hoped that some show might have been made by villagers independent of school-taught teams, but with the exception of two entries these were not forthcoming. Mr. Sam Bennett, of Ilmington, and his companions gave examples of several interesting dances, which were claimed to be traditional survivals. Mrs. Stanton, of Arnscoate, brought some dancers from Honington, who performed some very pretty traditional country dances: these were of great interest. This lady, too, produced a folk-song singer, an old lady who, though of feeble voice, gave a delightful rendering of 'The young and single sailor,' a folk-song she had remembered from her youth, but versions of which have already been published by Mr. Baring-Gould and Mr. Cecil Sharp. Mr. Sam Bennett, too, gave a couple of traditional folk-songs with gusto and spirit; one of these was sung, in conjunction with a lady, as a duet.

Some speechmaking and votes of thanks concluded the festival.

Mr. A. D. Flower, the chairman of the Governors of the Memorial Theatre, in thanking the Hon. Mrs. Hodgson (who distributed the certificates), the judges and others, mentioned that certain criticism had been made regarding the method of dancing the Morris. He was glad to see Mr. Cecil Sharp present, and he would ask him to second the vote of thanks, and hoped he would make a few remarks with a view to dissipate some of the impressions that had got abroad. Mr. Sharp, Mr. Kidson and Miss Neal were all companions trying to organize and revive Morris-dancing and folk-song singing, and they had one great object at heart—to bring more joy into the life of the people.

Mr. Sharp, in responding, said he was in a difficult position, for he had been told he belonged to that unhappy class of people called 'experts,' and it seemed to him that this word was rapidly becoming the most objectionable name they could call a man. He was extremely interested in the development of this festival of folk-song and dance, the beginning of which he had some hand in last year. It was a very small affair then to what it was now, and it was indeed a pleasure to see how it had grown. The idea that this town should take a leading part, should be the centre of this great revival, was one that appealed to him strongly, and he could not imagine a better place than Stratford-on-Avon, the home of the immortal Shakespeare, who was himself the incarnation of all that was happy and beautiful, of all that one associated with the spring and May-time. Here they were trying to restore to the members of the younger generation that to which the older generation was denied, their proper birth-right of the old songs and dances of the country. In every movement it was an unhappy sign when those who engineered it failed to agree among themselves. He had collected, as they knew, a very large number of traditional songs and dances, many of which he had published. In the prosecution of this work he had always realised that he was incurring a great responsibility; for, clearly, it was his bounden duty to take care that the songs and dances so published were genuine, unaltered examples of the people's art, and that they were performed in the true traditional manner. It was on this point that differences had arisen. He had felt it necessary to criticise some of the ways in which certain dances had been danced. But all his criticism had been directed to one end, to ensure the transference of the songs and dances from one class to the other without hurt or harm. If this criticism had been misinterpreted—as he understood it had, by some people—then he was very sorry. He had heard it suggested that he was responsible for stating that Miss Neal had taught some of the dances in an unpleasant manner. He could not recollect a word he had spoken or written that could be so interpreted; at any rate, he could assure them that the statement with which he had been credited did not express what he thought nor what he intended to say. If this contradiction would help to heal the difference that unhappily existed, then, so far as he was concerned, that afternoon would have been well spent.

It may be mentioned that the present festival was, in its general items, intended for display in the spring (from April 22 to May 14), but the King's death prevented this, and a summer festival was arranged. This has been such a success that its continuance, in addition to the usual spring celebration, has been decided upon, and the committee are doing their best, with every appearance of success, to make the Stratford festivals truly national in character and with more value behind them than mere pageant-like amusements.

MUSIC IN BLACKPOOL.

Whilst music in our large Lancashire centres is silent during the long summer days, there is plenty to be heard at the numerous watering-places of the north-western seaboard. At Llandudno, Colwyn Bay, Rhyl, Southport, Lytham, St. Annes-on-Sea, Blackpool and Morecambe, are to be found orchestras numbering anything from twenty to fifty players, whilst Buxton and Harrogate among the inland spas are similarly well-situated. Not only are the rank and file of the players of a decently high standard, but the conductors are men who, during the winter-time, take an important part in the musical life of our northern cities. Mr. Arthur Payne at Llandudno, Mr. Lyell-Taylor at Buxton, Mr. W. Rimmer at Southport, Mr. Vasco Akeroyd (temporarily) at St. Annes-on-Sea, are typical cases, whilst in Blackpool alone Mr. Simon Speelman at the North Pier, Mr. J. Woof Gags at the Tower, and Mr. Landon Ronald at the Winter Gardens, form a trio of conductors not to be found in much larger centres. This takes no cognisance of the numerous theatre and other orchestras attached to Blackpool's multitudinous places of amusement. Generally speaking, private enterprise (or that of limited liability companies) and not public, is the rule, although at some of the watering-places—Southport and St. Annes-on-Sea, for instance—orchestral music is a municipal undertaking. With a few exceptions the length of these seaside musical seasons is limited to July, August and September, when the crowds are greatest. It may be said safely that, Bournemouth apart, no watering-place has done more to popularize good music than has Blackpool, and Professor Simon Speelman is not unnaturally proud of the lead taken there by the North Pier Orchestra, which he has conducted now for twenty-eight consecutive years. Here the season commences with the Easter holidays, and after a break runs from Whitsuntide until the middle of September. The Orchestra plays twice daily, averaging not less than a score of pieces per day, so it will be evident that a large library is necessary from which to draw the 2,200 selections making up the programmes. A few years ago Dr. Richter sent Mr. Speelman, as a present, a collection of high-class light music, consisting of German and Hungarian pieces.

Mr. Speelman is well able to gauge the difference manifested in public taste during the last two or three decades. A generation ago it demanded quadrille or valse selections; more recently selections from Gilbert and Sullivan comic opera, or from those of the 'Geisha' or 'Floradora,' type; nowadays the Pier audiences want Haydn, Beethoven, Schubert, Wagner, Tchaikovsky. The morning's post once brought two requests from visitors, regarding the next day's programme, one asking for Schubert's 'Unfinished' symphony and the other for a selection from a current musical comedy. Mr. Speelman played both the 'by request' items, one after the other, and the lady who had asked for the musical comedy afterwards apologised to the conductor, saying how tawdry it had sounded after the Schubert: 'it was like getting a cold bath.' Another of the above-named conductors tells of substituting a Beethoven symphony movement for a more frivolous item, the only intimation of the change being an announcement that it was 'by request.' No item at that particular concert received a tithe of the applause which greeted the symphony movement, and at the close a white-haired gentleman approached the conductor and said, 'You did not give us the "selection" item, number so-and-so, this afternoon, but it was a very good and beautiful substitute.' So the leaven of improving musical taste spreads.

During week-ends the North Pier evening concerts are always held in the large Pavilion, and distinguished vocalists are engaged. A most pleasing feature of Mr. Speelman's conductorship has always been the ready and generous sympathy shown to young instrumental and vocal soloists fresh from Conservatoire or College. It would be quite easy to name a dozen or more persons now well advanced in their profession who received quite early recognition from him at these Blackpool concerts. Young composers, too, have been able to give their works 'trial trips,' and these Lancashire holiday audiences are both discriminating and encouraging on these occasions.

The concerts conducted by Mr. J. W. Gags and Mr. Landon Ronald are held on Sunday evenings, about ten in number, during the height of the summer season. Both at the Winter Gardens Pavilion (where the annual competitive musical festival is held) and at the Tower Ballroom, huge audiences are usual and low prices of admission the rule. The respective managements vie with each other in the engagement of soloists, price being apparently no object, and occasionally one has witnessed the spectacle of Kubelik and Kreisler, or Kreisler and Mischa Elman, both playing in the town on the same night; whilst the week-end would find such a conjunction as Melba, Agnes Nicholls, Kirkby Lunn, Ben Davies, Robert Radford, all to be heard on Saturday and Sunday. Some places would call this a 'festival,' but Blackpool looks upon it as a matter-of-course, and the artisan visitor can hear most of it for sixpence! though the lowest price rises to one shilling on Melba nights.

Blackpool has come to be regarded as a convenient starting point for provincial tours; here Caruso began his triumphal progress last autumn, and the Beecham opera is here to commence its three months of travel on September 5. So the feast of music is kept going until the great competitive festival, lasting a week, comes in the middle of October, bringing amazing instances of the keenest appreciation of music of the severest type—Cornelius's 'Vätergruft' was sung a few years ago six times in succession, and then encores—and scenes of enthusiasm hard to describe in cold print.

MORRIS DANCES IN PARIS.

At the International Congress of School Hygiene, held in Paris on August 3, a feature was the performance of Morris and other dances by Students of the Chelsea Physical Training College, under the direction of Mr. Cecil Sharp. The following was the programme:

GYMNASTIQUES.

Description des danses M. CECIL SHARP.

DANCES 'MORRIS':

BOBBING JOE.
BRIGHTON CAMP.
PRINCESS ROYAL.

DANCES POPULAIRES:

RIBBON DANCE.
POP GOES THE WEASEL.

Description des danses

DANCES NATIONALES:

IRISH JIG.
SCOTCH REEL.
HIGHLAND FLING.

A description of the dances and a statement of their utility was given in the programme in French, German and English. The performance was a very great success. It had to be repeated on the following evening at the entertainment given by the French doctors to their English and American colleagues. This was probably the first occasion on which these characteristically British dances have been given in Paris.

Foreign Notes.

On July 9, a memorial plate with a portrait in relief was unveiled at the house in Ems where Richard Wagner stayed in 1877.

The composer Arnold Schönberg, whose ultra-modern works have aroused strong demonstrations of approval and disapproval on the occasion of their performance in Vienna, has been appointed Professor of Composition at the Kaiserl. Königl. Akademie der Musik in Vienna.

During the recent Mozart festival in Salzburg, a newly-found portrait of the master was exhibited in the Mozart Museum. It was painted in oils by the famous Jean Baptiste Greuze, during the sojourn of the Mozart family in Paris, either between November 18, 1763, and April 10, 1764, or May 16 and July 9, 1766.

BERLIN.

At the Neues Königliches Operntheater the season of grand opera, given under the management of Herr Hermann Gura, has been proceeding with success. Besides two very good performances of Wagner's 'Tristan und Isolde,' the first performance in Berlin of Siegfried Wagner's opera 'Der Kobold' was given, and formed one of the most notable of recent features. The opinions of the critics were, however, by no means unanimously favourable.

BRUSSELS.

The great organ placed in the Concert Hall of the Universal Exhibition was inaugurated by Herr Alfred Sittard, who gave two interesting recitals on July 6 and 8. The programme included well-known works by Bach, and some interesting compositions by Liszt, Reger, and Karg-Elert.—Another interesting occasion was the appearance of the Conservatoire Orchestra from Paris, under the conductorship of M. André Messager. The programme included Paul Dukas's Symphony, Debussy's 'L'après-midi d'un faune,' the 'Fragment symphonique' from César Franck's 'Rédemption,' Saint-Saëns's symphonic poem 'Phaëton,' 'Shylock,' by Gabriel Fauré, and the 'Fête chez Capulet' from Berlioz's symphony 'Roméo et Juliet.'—On July 16 and 17, two concerts devoted to German composers were given by the Cologne Gürzenich Orchestra and Chorus, under the direction of Herr Fritz Steinbach. The programmes included Bach's Magnificat, the eight-part motet 'Singe dem Herrn ein neues Lied,' and the Brandenburg Concerto in F, with solo trumpet; excerpts from Beethoven's 'Missa solennis' and the 'Choral Symphony,' Mozart's 'Ave verum,' and Brahms's 'Song of destiny,' Contemporary German music was represented by Max Schillings's 'Hochzeitlied' (conducted by the composer), and Strauss's 'Till Eulenspiegel.'—Mention should also be made of the excellent Ysäye concert, on July 31. M. Raoul Pugno aroused great enthusiasm by his splendid playing in Peter Benoit's 'Poème symphonique' for pianoforte and orchestra, as did also Messrs. Eugène Ysäye and Jaques Thibaud in a memorable performance of Bach's Concerto for two violins and string orchestra. Other items of the programme were fragments of César Franck's 'Les Béatitudes' and the 'Fantaisie sur un thème populaire,' for orchestra, by Théo Ysäye.

BUDWEIS.

Dvorák's 'The Spectre's bride' will be performed on December 8 by the 'Unterstützungsverein für arme Schüler der böhmischen Lehrerbildungsanstalt.'

GENEVA.

The recent musical season has had many features of interest. The leading place in the musical activities of the city is occupied by the Subscription Orchestral Concerts, conducted by Herr Stavenhagen. The programmes of this series included the nine symphonies of Beethoven, Berlioz's symphony 'Harold en Italie,' and the symphonic poems 'Tasso' ('Lamento e trionfo'), by Liszt, and 'Don Juan,' by Richard Strauss. A symphony by the Swiss composer, Ernest Bloch, and Mahler's third Symphony proved interesting and attractive. Bantock's overture 'The pierrot of the minute,' the Pianoforte concerto by Rimsky-Korsakoff (soloist, M. Ricardo Vines), and Jaques-Dalcroze's 'Poem' for violin and orchestra were given for the first time in Geneva.

MUNICH.

The series of twelve symphony concerts given by the Münchener Konzertverein (conductor, Herr Ferdinand Löwe) at the Neue Musik-Festhalle in the Exhibition, commenced on August 5. At the six concerts that have so far been given, the following symphonies were played: the first five of Beethoven, Schubert's in C major, Mendelssohn's 'Scotch Symphony,' Schumann's second Symphony in C major, Berlioz's Symphonie fantastique and Liszt's 'Faust Symphony' for orchestra, tenor solo and male-vocal chorus.

SALZBURG.

The eagerly anticipated Mozart Festival, given under the auspices of the Salzburg Mozarteum, opened on July 29 and concluded on August 6. The venture was entirely successful. Operatic and instrumental artists of the very front rank lent their valuable aid gratuitously, and the excellent Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra was engaged. 'Don Giovanni' (in Italian) and 'Die Zauberflöte' (in German) were each performed three times. In the former work Signor Scotti played the title-part with great effect, and was worthily supported by Signor Andrea de Segurora as Leporello. Miss Geraldine Farrar and Madame Lili Lehmann as Zerlina and Donna Anna both sang and acted to perfection. Dr. Karl Muck conducted with rare insight and understanding. In 'Die Zauberflöte,' the female parts were most efficiently represented by Fräulein Frieda Hempel (Königin der Nacht) and Mesdames Gadsky (Pamina) and Lili Lehmann as the first of the 'Genien.' Among the male artists Herr Lieban took the palm, singing and acting the part of Monostatos in genuine buffo style. Messrs. Mayr and Slezak, from Vienna, were excellent in the parts of Sarastro and Tamino. Six concerts were given, providing an excellent résumé of the other branches of Mozart's work. At the first of these, which was devoted to sacred music, the Psalm 'Laudate pueri' (composed in 1787, while Mozart was still in the service of the ducal Archbishop of Salzburg), the motet 'Ave verum' and the 'Requiem' were performed. At the first chamber music matinée, the Fitzner Quartet gave fine interpretations of the C major String quartet and the Piano-forte quintet in G minor (with Herr Ernst von Dohnányi at the pianoforte). Vocal solos were contributed by Miss Geraldine Farrar. At the fourth concert some less known works were presented, including the Quintet with horn, and an air from the early German opera 'Zaide.' The Quintet in E flat, for pianoforte and wind instruments, and the interesting Serenade (in six movements) for thirteen wind instruments were given at the fifth concert. On the morning of August 6, the ceremony of laying the foundation stone of the Mozart House took place. Speeches were delivered by the Archduke Eugen, Count Kuenburg and Dr. Robert Hirschfeld. The ceremony was preceded by Divine Service, at which the music consisted of Mozart's 'Credomessa' in C and the Halleluja, sung by Lili Lehmann, who, besides taking a prominent share in the performances, had under her supervision the artistic arrangement of the whole festival. In the evening, the last orchestral concert was given under the conductorship of Herr Karl Muck. The programme included the Symphony in E flat, the C minor Pianoforte concerto (solo pianoforte, Madame Gabrielle Leschetizky), a vocal solo, sung by Madame Lehmann (who was the object of a great ovation), and the 'Jupiter Symphony,' which triumphantly terminated the proceedings.

Amongst other new departures which will mark the Jubilee Church Congress to be held at its birth-place in Cambridge during the last week of September, it will be found that more than usual attention has been paid to bringing the subject of Church Music into prominence. A small committee of the Diocesan Society, to which several leading musicians in the University have kindly lent their assistance, has arranged for an important lecture to be given in the large Examination Hall on the afternoon of Wednesday, September 28, and they have been fortunate enough to secure the valuable aid of Principal Hadow, of Armstrong College, Newcastle-on-Tyne, the subject being: 'The History of English Church Music since the Reformation,' embracing the period from Tye and Byrd to Walmisley and S. S. Wesley. Musical illustrations will be given by the choirs of Trinity and St. John's Colleges, and the chair will be taken by the Bishop of Ely as President of the Congress. The music each day at Evensong in the respective College Chapels, under the direction of Dr. Mann at King's, Dr. Alan Gray at Trinity, and Dr. Rootham at St. John's, will be chosen for the most part from the works of those composers represented in the illustrations of Dr. Hadow's lecture. On the evening of Thursday, September 29, there will be a recital of English church music in the Chapel of St. Catherine's College, with an address by the Bishop of Bristol.

His Majesty The King has accepted a copy of Miss Maud Benham's 'Grand Marche Militaire,' written for military band. The march is dedicated, by permission, to His Royal Highness the late Duke of Saxe-Coburg and Gotha.

The excellent record of the series of concerts given by King's School, Canterbury, between 1900 and 1908, is tabulated in a recent number of the 'Cantuarian.' The director of the series was Mr. Percy Godfrey, who organized and trained a choir containing upwards of seventy boys of the school, and secured the services of an orchestra of over thirty performers. The choral works performed included choruses from Handel's 'Acis and Galatea,' Gluck's 'Armide,' and from operas by Weber, Bizet, Auber, Gounod and Wagner. The classics were largely drawn upon for the separate orchestral numbers, and the more 'popular' selections were on the level represented by Tchaikovsky's 'Casse noisette' and Grieg's 'Peer Gynt' suites, Berlioz's 'Dance of Sylphs,' and Schubert's 'Rosamunde' music. Works by Dr. H. C. Perrin, Mr. C. Gann and Mr. H. C. Fricker were specially composed for these concerts. Chamber music received due attention, and boy-composers at the school were not neglected.

A new Philharmonic Society has been recently organized at Perth, Western Australia, the idea having been initiated by a local musician, Mr. Herbert C. Goff, who convened a meeting of some of the leading citizens, which was presided over by the Mayor. A strong committee was formed, Mr. Goff was appointed conductor, and rehearsals were commenced without delay. The Society gave its inaugural concert in St. George's Hall on June 30 last, with a choir of some eighty voices, augmented by a small but well-selected orchestra. The works performed were Mendelssohn's 'Hear my prayer' and Stainer's 'Daughter of Jairus,' with a few miscellaneous items. Mrs. Percy Marchant, Miss Rene Sara, Messrs. Rhys Francis and G. C. Haywood were the solo vocalists. The work of the choir was excellent, and gave great promise for the future. At the conclusion of a most successful concert, the conductor was warmly congratulated on the highly satisfactory results of his efforts.

As a result of the recent competition at Trinity College of Music, the following have been awarded scholarships, tenable at the College for one year, with a possible renewal thereof: Doris S. Fell and Patrick Thayer (pianoforte); Alice E. Booth, Jennie Clarke and Edith E. Hillard (singing); Walter M. Witherick (organ); Margaret Bradfield, Samuel Kutcher and Evelyn M. Moore (violin); Dorothy M. Beattie (oboe); Giovanni E. Barbirolli (violinello). Free tuition for one year, with possible renewal, has been awarded to: Harry A. Gray and Eunice S. Lucas (theory); John S. Priestley (singing). Also free tuition or a scholarship to: Wyldé Leyland and Frederick E. Woodhouse (singing). The following were highly commended: Edie Marr (pianoforte), John A. Tatam and Leonard Gordon (organ), Nellie Simpson (violin), Sarah M. Adams, Olga S. Borsdorf, Dorothy M. Chambers, Ethel M. Harvey, Eveline Matthews, Ruby L. M. Shepherd and Vera G. Steel (singing).

A remarkable musical programme is announced for performance in connection with an Arts and Crafts Exhibition to be held in the Town Hall, Birmingham, on September 20, 21, 22, and 24. There will be an orchestral concert every evening, at which the Birmingham Symphony Orchestra will perform. English composers whose works are not so well known as they ought to be, are being given a unique chance. The following works will be included: Symphonic poem 'Midnight' (Rutland Boughton), 'Spring Idyll' (H. Ormond Anderson), 'The Blessed Damozel,' cantata (Edgar Bainton), Symphony in C minor (Algernon Ashton). Works by Berlioz, Tchaikovsky, Bach, Hugo Wolf, Elgar, Wagner, Schumann, Schubert, Beethoven, and Bantock are also announced. Mr. Rutland Boughton is to conduct.

The annual exhibition of the Associated Board of the Royal Academy of Music and the Royal College of Music for candidates in Canada, has this year been awarded to Jaroslav Bauer, a young coal-miner from Michel, British Columbia, who won honours in the advanced grade of violin-playing. Jaroslav Bauer was a pupil at the Calgary Conservatory of Music, where the local examinations of the Associated Board were held early in June. Mr. T. F. Dunhill, of the Royal College of Music, was the examiner.

It would be hard to find a parallel to the record of Mr. T. Wicks, of Wells, Somerset. He is in his ninety-first year, and has been singing as a chorister since his boyhood. He was admitted to the choir at St. George's Chapel, Windsor, in 1826, and to that of Wells Cathedral in 1845. Among the notable events at which he sang were the funeral of George IV. and the coronations of William IV. and Edward VII.

Mr. William Burbidge, after thirty-seven years' service as chief of the clerical staff of Messrs. J. Brinsmead & Sons, Ltd., is now about to retire. Mr. Burbidge remembers the time when Messrs. Brinsmead's was the only pianoforte house in Wigmore Street. He carries with him in his well-earned repose the hearty good-wishes of the friends he has made. It may be hoped that he will be long spared.

On July 12 the wedding of Mr. Otley Marshall and Miss Chrissie Luig took place at St. John's Church, Southend-on-Sea. Mr. Marshall is organist of the Parish Church, Buckhurst Hill, conductor of the Buckhurst Hill Choral Society, and an associate-conductor of the Imperial Choir.

The Etude, published in Philadelphia, announces a prize competition for pianoforte compositions. The prizes offered in five sections amount to £100. Entries close on January 1. Particulars can be obtained on application to the publisher, 1712, Chestnut Street, Philadelphia, U.S.A.

The Crystal Palace Management have arranged with Mr. Percy Harrison for the appearance of Madame Tetrazzini at the Crystal Palace on September 24. On this occasion Madame Tetrazzini will be supported by a company of well-known artists.

We understand that Mr. Julien Henry, the baritone, will in future give himself up entirely to professional work. He leaves England on October 1 for a three months' tour in the United States and Canada with Madame Liza Lehmann's concert party.

Mr. S. Coleridge-Taylor has been commissioned to write a Violin fantasia on American melodies for the Litchfield Festival, Connecticut, U.S.A.

We have received several Choral Society programmes for the coming season. These we shall include in our usual full list to be given in our October issue.

Answers to Correspondents.

DULCIAN.—'Troubled' and 'humbled' should not be pronounced 'trub-led' and 'hum-bled.' The 'l' in each case stands for a vowel. Short oo as you suggest will sound more like English.

W. B. O. L., SEAFORTH.—The Licentiate examination of the Royal Academy of Music, and the similar examination of the Royal College of Music, are valuable diplomas. We do not care to compare their value with certificates of other examining bodies.

HAROLD POPE.—A copy of 'Musica Sacra' has no great pecuniary value. The date is 1724. At the sale of the late Julian Marshall's library, in 1884, a copy was sold for twelve shillings, but no doubt it would fetch more now—perhaps nearer £2.

VOX.—A small nasal passage might have the effect you describe, but it would greatly depend upon your habit of using resonance chambers. The nasality (so far as it is disagreeable) might very well be neutralized by a new placing of the voice.

LIEBLICH GEDACT had better get the volume of Pedal Studies from Best's 'Treatise on the Organ'; and later, vol. viii. of 'Bach's Organ Works,' and work at the eight small Preludes and Fugues, commencing with that in G minor.

SCHUMANN.—Most of Schumann's songs are published by Messrs. Novello with English words. Apply for a list. The whole collection, edited by Madame Schumann, is published with German words by Messrs. Breitkopf & Härtel.

A. C.—Con sordino means with the mute. It is often applied to stringed instruments and also to brass instruments. The tone becomes veiled, distant and mysterious when thus damped.

CARDIFF.—It is difficult to make positive statements as to early Welsh music. The article on that topic in 'Grove's Dictionary,' vol. v., will perhaps help you.

C. F.—'Grove's Dictionary of Music' (new edition) is published in five volumes at one guinea each by Messrs. Macmillan & Co.

W. S., BURSLEM.—We regret we cannot trace the tune.

Other answers are unavoidably held over, or have been given privately.

FREDERICK CHOPIN

AS A MAN AND MUSICIAN

BY

FREDERICK NIECKS

WITH A PORTRAIT ETCHED BY H. R. ROBERTSON, AND FACSIMILES OF THE COMPOSER'S MS.

EXTRACTS FROM PREFACE.

My guiding principle has been to place before the reader the facts collected by me as well as the conclusions at which I arrived. This will enable him to see the subject in all its bearings, with all its pros and cons, and to draw his own conclusions, should mine not obtain his approval.

My researches had for their object the whole life of Chopin and his historical, political, artistical, social, and personal surroundings, but they were chiefly directed to the least known and most interesting period of his career—his life in France, and his visits to Germany and Great Britain.

SEVENTH AND REVISED EDITION.

A HANDBOOK OF EXAMINATIONS IN MUSIC

CONTAINING
600 QUESTIONS WITH ANSWERS

BY
ERNEST A. DICKS,

Fellow of the Royal College of Organists.

PREFACE TO THE SEVENTH EDITION.

Through the kindness of Dr. E. H. Turpin the seventh edition of the Handbook of Examinations in Music includes the latest type of Papers set by Trinity College of Music, London, in their scheme of Local Examinations in Musical Knowledge.

The work will also be found to have been considerably enlarged by the addition of fifty specimen questions, with answers. They have been designed for the most part after the manner of those set in the Theory Paper for the L.R.A.M. Diploma, and also that required by candidates for the Higher Practical Examinations held by Trinity College of Music, London. The author earnestly hopes that these additions will considerably enhance the value of the Handbook, and render it increasingly helpful to students.

A VALUABLE BOOK FOR TEACHERS AND STUDENTS.

TECHNIQUE AND EXPRESSION IN PIANOFORTE PLAYING BY FRANKLIN TAYLOR.

EXTRACT FROM PREFACE.

In the course of my experience as a teacher of the pianoforte, an experience extending over many years, certain ideas have from time to time suggested themselves to me which have proved useful—to myself, as enabling me to express more clearly that which I desired my pupils to understand, and to my pupils, as tending to facilitate their comprehension of the various difficulties they have had to encounter, at the same time leading them to perceive the most practical means of overcoming them, and thus accelerating their general rate of progress.

These suggestions relate to both the mechanical and intellectual sides of the study of pianoforte-playing, or briefly, to Technique and Expression, the chief matters implied by the first of these terms being the production of various qualities of tone, the choice of suitable fingering, and the best methods of attacking certain difficulties; while the second, which may perhaps be more aptly designated the means of expression, includes rhythm, phrasing, variety and gradation of tone, the use of the pedals, et cetera.

WORKS OF THE GREAT MASTERS.

JOAN OF ARC

AN HISTORICAL CANTATA

FOR THREE SOLO VOICES, CHORUS AND ORCHESTRA

MUSIC BY

ALFRED R. GAUL.

"Few Cantatas are as rich in chaste melodies, charming choruses, and exquisite orchestration as Alfred R. Gaul's 'Joan of Arc,' performed for the first time in Plymouth by the Vocal Association in the Guildhall."

—The Western News.
"Must enhance the high reputation of its composer."—Liverpool Courier.

"The inspiration of a highly-refined musician; . . . The Cantata is even a more masterly and beautiful work than 'The Holy City.'"

—Huddersfield Examiner.
"No more charming Cantata than 'Joan of Arc' could have been chosen. It abounds in delicious music. There is not a tedious note in it."—Newcastle-on-Tyne Daily Chronicle.

"Gives the listener a vivid and realistic impression, its attractiveness being continuous instead of spasmodic."—Bradford Observer.

"The Exeter Oratorio Society last night achieved a brilliant success, and it may safely be said, without fear of exaggeration, that never before have they performed a work more satisfactory to themselves or more interesting to the audience than 'Joan of Arc.'"—Western Times.

"One of the most delightful Concerts ever given by the South Shields Choral Society was that of last evening, when the principal piece was 'Joan of Arc.' We cannot speak too highly of Mr. Gaul's work, which is of the most interesting description."—The Shields Daily News

Price, paper cover, 2s. 6d.; paper boards, 3s.; scarlet cloth, 4s.

MR. WALTER FORD ON EXPRESSION.

AT the annual meeting of the Association of Musical Competition Festivals held in July, and reported in our last issue, Mr. Walter Ford read a paper to which we then made only brief allusion. We now give a report which, although not a full one, will explain Mr. Ford's thoughtful views.

Mr. Ford began by saying:

Expression is the end of life. To express ourselves is to fulfil the law of our being; to make ourselves effective, to succeed. This is the only condition of growth. Not to express ourselves is to defeat the law of our being, to be ineffective, to fail, to arrest our growth. We have many powers through which we express ourselves—bodily, mental, and spiritual powers: these latter are usually manifested through our emotions. But the three spheres represented by body, mind, and spirit are not three isolated compartments: the doors between them are always open. There is danger and loss if we live in one of them, or even in two. The complete man holds a just balance between all three. An idea comes to him in his spirit or is felt as true. It is apprehended and reasoned out by the mind. Physical action translates it into reality or fact.

He went on to say that expression must be our real self:

To show an artificial self is to wear a mask before our fellow men. This may make an impression, but it is not expression. The real self is the best self. Our instinct tells us this. Do we not excuse many a doubtful action by saying of those who committed them, that they were weak at the time—'not quite themselves'?

The value of art consists in its somewhat exceptional power of awakening this real self from its habitual tendency to slumber; in fact, drawing out, encouraging, and cultivating the best that is in us.

Many things reveal to us at rare moments this real self. Can we not all recall them? A sunset, a sight of distant hills, a face, a form, a picture, a cathedral, a voice, a song, a symphony. Because they once touched us very nearly they have become part of us: they revealed us to ourselves; we should have been different, and less, without them. If it was music, we understand the lines of Browning:

'But God has a few of us
Whom he whispers in the ear,
The rest may reason and welcome:
'Tis we musicians know.'

This is the self, which music helps us to get at, which we need to express (to 'press out'), which through expression grows, which without expression stagnates or dies. 'Men the world over,' says Professor James, 'possess means of resource which only a very few exceptional individuals push to their extremes of use. Most of us continue to live unnecessarily near our surface.'

In applying these suggestions as to the meaning of expression to our musical life, it is wise to realise that this highest self of which at rare moments we obtain glimpses can hardly be our constant companion. We cannot habitually live upon the heights. We are human, not divine. But there are good places below the mountain tops wherein it is pleasant and profitable to dwell. Yet the knowledge that there is a summit possible to reach makes all the difference. It ennobles the smallest details of our daily work. The fatal thing for a man is never to acquire that knowledge, or, having acquired it, to lose faith in it, or to forget it.

In the main our difficulties always bring us back to the eternal problem of the true relations between expression and technique, idealism, materialism, subjective and objective, spirit and letter, to the antagonism between body and mind, which represent the letter and are concerned with technique, and the feelings which represent the spirit and are concerned with expression. Our mistakes mostly arise through vain attempts to make watertight compartments between the functions of body, mind, and spirit. Expression which, in theory at least, we all agree in recognising as the aid of art, is so obviously dependent on mind and body for intelligent, external presentation, that we are tempted to cultivate first our technical resources and our power of mind, and to leave the real thing, which is the spirit and the feeling, to be sent in later on. The natural result is that what we eventually put in is not expression, but the 'marks of expression.' Our last step should in reality be the first step, for the latter kills but the spirit makes alive.

The young find technique dull because they have not first learned to love music. They work at it before the object of the work has been revealed to them. And too often the actual work required of them is of a nature designed apparently to quench any musical instinct which they may possess. Let me give an instance: It is recognised that rhythm is the most elemental power in music, and that as a race we English are deficient in the sense of rhythm, and that the cause of our deficiency must be looked for in that reserve or self-consciousness which prevents us from surrendering ourselves, from 'letting ourselves go,' as the phrase is.

Instead, however, of regarding rhythm as a power which we can understand only by giving ourselves up to it, we begin by studying it through the symbols of musical notations, which necessarily misrepresent it, exhibiting it as a thing cut up into so many pieces of equal length and confined within bars. Whereas rhythm is free. In reality by this method we teach time, not rhythm, and attempt the analysis of a power before the power itself has been realised. We develop then a wrong attitude from the start.

I was once present while a teacher of young children hammered out on one note of a pianoforte with a hard, relentless finger, successions of crochets and quavers forming part of no intelligible rhythm whatever, but mere heartless puzzles for the ear. These the children had to reproduce with the chalk upon a blackboard. Is this method likely to quicken the rhythmical sense or to destroy it?

It is equally wrong to begin harmony by analysing chords, especially for the young, for whom harmony should mean the introduction to a new world; the introduction should be given not through the brain, but through the feelings and the imagination, through living music, not through dead exercises.

Even beauty of tone, through which undoubtedly the best part of us can be reached, must be something more than mere prettiness. There must be more in it than mere correct voice-production. Dead tones which express nothing are useless tones. At the least the sense of physical enjoyment and exhilaration must be in them, which we find in successful strokes at games. That enjoyment is a real part of ourselves, a necessary quality in all true expression. That the main hindrance to obtaining it lies in one of the many subtle forms assumed by self-consciousness, is a fact which those who depend upon systems of voice-production seldom realise. Again, as I have already intimated, it is useless to teach expression through the means of expression. To sing piano or forte because you are told, is to substitute a conventional obedience for what should be a felt necessity. Could anything, for instance, be more absurd, more deadening to all true expression, than the marks which are showered broadcast over the pages of Hymns Ancient and Modern? Why should every congregation be expected to sing 'In life' forte, and 'In death' piano, in 'Abide with me'—or at the last word of a hymn of praise, ending 'We worship and adore,' sink the voice to a whisper?

Expression marks at the best are only a sort of guide for the unintelligent. Even Schumann, who considerably increased their number, said that composers were not the best judges of how their own works should be performed. In fact, if I may make a confession, the feats of accuracy which are so easily obtained from children, as well as from grown up persons, impress me very little unless they plainly serve a higher purpose. To recognise a chord when we hear it, to know its official name, to be able to write it on a blackboard, to mark the intricacies of time-signatures of the Tonic Sol-fa and the Staff Notations, the power to read correctly at sight are very useful accomplishments; but it is possible to possess them all and yet never know what music really means, to make use of them all and never express a single thing that is worth expressing. Indeed, in the true spirit in acquiring them, some little spark may have gone out; and really it was just that little spark, that little bit of a real self peeping through, which we needed. The point for which I am contending is not that technique and knowledge can be disregarded, but they can never be trusted to ignite this spark.

Mr. Ford said that system in teaching is necessary to every branch, but what the teacher brings to it is far more than the system itself. We must beware of helping to decorate an empty shrine. In conclusion he said:

A memory stored with fine melodies is a priceless possession, but a condition is attached: they must have touched something deeper than the ear, they must have been something more than the occasion of using the voice correctly or of developing the capacity for reading at sight. I lately heard three choirs at one of our competitions come forward one after another and murder one of the most simple and touching melodies in the world. Yet presumably every member of them had passed through the elementary schools. Once, in one of our great towns, I heard a class of boys sing, a class trained with obvious care by a man known as a specialist in voice-production. They were doing their very best: that was clear from their strained, anxious faces. Yet every sound was painful to the ear, and I imagine, painful also to the stiff little throats. But after a hopeless breakdown and the burst of laughter which it caused, were heard clear, fresh, un-selfconscious children's voices. Lastly, about the same time, I heard classes of children (trained by that remarkable man, Mr. William Tomlins), whose singing of certain songs, both for beauty and for expression, will remain in my mind among the most cherished recollections of my musical life. What was Mr. Tomlins' secret? I will leave you to gather what you can from his profession that he did not aim at making the children musical, but through music to bring out the best part of the child nature; and I will add of myself that instead of putting music in he called music out.

THE GROWTH AND WORK OF THE DORSET CHORAL ASSOCIATION.

By MISS F. KINDERSLEY.

[This is an abstract of a paper also read at the meeting of the Association of Musical Competition Festivals.]

When the Dorset Choral Association was started in 1908, the district was believed by some to be hopelessly unmusical. A few years ago an effort was made to start a competition in one corner of Dorset, but it was soon abandoned, and there have been church choir festivals at Salisbury Cathedral from time to time. There they sang in time and as loud as they could, and learned a certain number of pieces, but not much was gained from a musical point of view.

A conversation at an Arts and Crafts Association Exhibition at Blandford, started the new Dorset Society. The question arose, 'Why don't you add music—the best of the arts?' This roused attention, and permission of the Arts and Crafts Committee was obtained to hold a music competition in 1908. But it was soon realised that the musical work had best be managed by a separate body, and the Choral Association came into being. The aim was not merely to give a treat to musical people, but to bring choral singing within the reach of every man, woman, and child capable of singing or of trying to sing.

In order to deal with the small scattered villages, the county was divided into districts, following those of the Poor Law Unions, of which there are twelve. These divisions have since been reduced to ten. Each district was managed by a local secretary, who arranged a local competition a month before the festival, and the winning choirs in each class then came to the final festival. Great interest was taken in the local events. Last year fifty-five choirs entered, and twenty-nine were sent to the final competition at Weymouth. The gathering was a surprising success to all concerned. The first schedule was a simple one. It announced three classes: (a) for towns, (b) for large villages, and (c) for small villages. Now, the Association had eight adult classes and six for children. If all the schools entered it would be possible to hold a children's day in each district. In this way the children and teachers could be benefited without their having to travel long distances. It was hard to make some people believe that 'choir' did not necessarily mean 'church choir,' and that competition of choirs did not mean rivalry between denominations. It would probably be some time before all concerned realised that the object was not to win but to improve. As it was, the festival scheme had done much good in providing hundreds of singers with delightful occupation during the winter months, the singing all round had rapidly improved, and the critical faculty had been aroused. A cowman in her choir, after finding that his side had beaten a neighbouring choir in the preliminary competition, said, 'It did seem to I that they was singing a bit flat'; and the conductor of the other choir admitted that

'HIS BEST TENOR WAS ONLY THERE OR THEREABOUTS.'

Another member of the winning choir—a cook—who was very anxious lest they should be beaten by a determined little choir of rather picked voices, said, after the victory, 'When I heard them sing the word "the" like that I thought we had a chance,' and she added, with scorn, 'the second of the bar, too!'

Plenty of material and genuine enthusiasm were found. Village chorallists offered to come every night of the week, and declared that the practices were their happiest hours. All unnecessary expenses were avoided, but they had determined to engage the best judges available, and to give grants to necessitous choirs. Mr. Harry Evans, their judge this year, wrote as follows: 'It gave me great pleasure to hear your village choirs and to note that generally speaking the technique of the singing was well up to the average of such gatherings.' Another of their judges, Mr. Dan Price, had expressed his great satisfaction with the results attained, and he was particularly impressed with the tone of the combined choirs.

As part of the business arrangements of the festival, forty-five minutes were allotted after lunch-time for a gathering of subscribers and conductors to meet the judges. This was a safety-valve, rather than a time of definite instruction. The suggestion has been made that next year a more instructive gathering, especially for conductors, might also be held.

CORRESPONDENCE.

TO THE EDITOR OF 'THE COMPETITION FESTIVAL RECORD.'

DEAR SIR,—May I venture to offer a suggestion, which, if it were possible to adopt, would greatly increase the value of your interesting record to the committees and officials responsible for selecting the test-pieces for the numerous festivals, a duty of which it is impossible to over-estimate the importance.

In your accounts and criticisms of festivals, could you comment more frequently on the test-pieces, their beauty and suitability, or the reverse; and where any pieces of exceptional merit are chosen for competition, draw your readers' attention to the same?

The festival in which I am interested is now in its twelfth year, and it is getting more and more difficult to select suitable music for the large number of competitions in various grades of difficulty. The musical sub-committee responsible for choosing our music has for local reasons to consist of amateurs, and being far removed from the large centres of music has few opportunities of hearing fine music. It would be of immense help to us if the occasional criticisms of the music favourable and the reverse, now to be found in your reports of festivals, were considerably extended.

These festivals afford such golden opportunities of educating people in discriminating between good and bad music that I feel I may be excused in thus putting this suggestion before you.—Yours truly,

A. RICARDO.

Sion Mills, co. Tyrone,
July 2, 1910.

[The idea has often occurred to us, but exigencies of space and other difficulties have precluded our carrying it out. Adjudicators differ in their views as to interpretation, and the RECORD views might be in conflict. In case of difference of opinion, competitors might be tempted to pit one opinion against another. However, we may brave this contingency.]
—THE EDITOR.]

A LESSON IN IDENTIFICATION.

An apt illustration of the risks of wrong identification arising from the fear of judges being influenced in their decisions by seeing rather than by hearing is afforded by the following disagreeable case:

At the Middlesbrough County Court recently, Lawrence Gott, of Redcar, sued Mr. Gallimore, conductor of the South Bank Male-voice Choir, for the return of £10, prize money paid, it was alleged, by mistake, on Whit Monday, in connection with the choral competitions in the Pleasure Gardens at Saltburn.

Mr. Robson, for the plaintiff, explained that the Cleveland Harmonic Choir and the South Bank Male-voice Choir were marked Nos. 1 and 2 respectively on the programme, but appeared before the adjudicator in reverse order. The adjudicator awarded the first prize to No. 1, and the plaintiff, who was acting as secretary of the competitions, in the hurry of the moment, made out the cheque to the South Bank Choir, who were the first to sing, but were marked No. 2 on the programme.

Mr. Clarke, for the defence, said that if the facts were as stated he would not defend the case. His instructions were entirely different.

Evidence having been given for the plaintiff,

His Honour, the judge, considered there was no defence, and entered judgment for the plaintiff, with costs.

THE NATIONAL EISTEDDFOD.

COLWYN BAY, September 13 to 16.

The prospects of this year's Welsh national gathering are mixed. The total number of entries shows an increase over that of last year, but the fact that only one Welsh choir has undertaken to support the chief choral event is ominous.

The test-pieces and the entries in the chief competitions are as follows:

VOCAL.

Chief Choral (150 to 175 voices). (a) 'Requiem and Kyrie' from the 'Requiem Mass' (Mozart); (b) 'Trip we gaily' from 'Dewi Sant' (St. David) (Jenkins); (c) 'O! wild west wind' (Elgar). North Staffordshire, Southport, and Rhymney Gwent Choral Societies.

Second Choral (60 to 80 voices). (a) 'The Prayer' (Dr. Joseph Parry); (b) 'Deep in my soul' (Elgar), unaccompanied. Crewe, Bangor, Treconyn, and Cefn Mawr.

Male Choirs (60 to 80 voices). (a) 'Brwydr y Baltic' ('The Battle of the Baltic') (T. Osborne Roberts); (b) 'Sorrow's tears' (Cornelius); (c) 'The rider's song' (Cornelius). Swansea, Abergham, Garw, Manchester Orpheus, Nelson and Warrington.

Female Choirs (35 to 45 voices). (a) 'Come, sisters, come' (Mackenzie); (b) 'Sea Maidens' (D. D. Parry). Dublin, Carmarthen, Dowlais, Coedpoeth, Holyhead, and Bangor.

Children's Choirs (35 to 50 voices). (a) 'What can lambskins do' (Coleridge-Taylor); (b) 'In the snow now let us gather' (Pedr Alaw). Abercwmboi, Ogmores Vale, Somilly, Shrewsbury, Bangor, Aberystwyth, Pontypool, Holyhead, Rhos, and Rhyl.

Quartette (S.A.T.B.). 'Palm Sunday' (Josef E. Jones). 10 entries.

Duet (tenor and bass). 'The battle eve' (Bonheur). 36 entries.

Duet (soprano and contralto). 'The whisper of the breeze' (Tom Price). 27 entries.

Soprano solo. (a) 'O! had I Jubal's lyre' ('Joshua' (Handel)); (b) 'Olwen' (Bryceson Trehearne). 51 entries.

Mezzo-soprano solo. (a) 'Slumber song' (Wagner); (b) 'To living waters' (J. S. Bach). 53 entries.

Contralto solo. (a) 'All my heart inflamed and burning' ('Stabat Mater' (Dvorák)); (b) 'Jesu, Lover of my soul' (Linckar). 50 entries.

Tenor solo. (a) 'God breaketh the battle' ('Judith' (Dr. Hubert Parry)); (b) 'Morfudd, my loved one' (W. Davies). 46 entries.

Baritone solo. (a) 'Song of Pan' (Bach); (b) 'Glyndwr's Grave' (W. O. Jones). 54 entries.

Bass solo. (a) 'They that go down to the sea in ships' (Purcell); (b) 'Rhys ap Iorwng' (W. Davies). 34 entries.

Penillion singing with the harp (North Wales style). 8 entries.

Penillion singing with the harp (South Wales style). 7 entries.

INSTRUMENTAL.

Orchestral bands. Overture, 'Merry wives of Windsor' (Nicolai). 3 entries.

Pianoforte (open). Chopin's Scherzo in B flat minor (Op. 31). 72 entries.

Pianoforte (under 16 years of age). Schubert's Impromptu in F minor (Op. 142, No. 4). 30 entries.

Violin solo (open). 'Salterella' (Ed. German). 14 entries.

DR. COWEN AND THE EISTEDDFOD.

While staying in Cardiff for the purpose of rehearsing his new choral work, 'The Veil,' for the forthcoming Cardiff festival, Dr. Frederic H. Cowen, interviewed by the Western Mail, made the following remarks upon Welsh people in their relations to music:

'However keen their innate musical interests may be, there is a certain insularity and narrowness in those instincts which do not seem to yearn for anything beyond their own local efforts. I have noticed even in the Eisteddfodau that there seems to be no desire on the part of one competitor, or body of competitors, to listen to the efforts of others, and I have also noticed the hall crowded to listen to the competitive choirs, whereas at the evening concerts, which consist more or less of genuine music per se, the public is very much more scanty. It is a fact that a large musical festival was tried on non-competitive lines a good many years ago, but it was an absolute failure.'

Questioned as to the influence of the Eisteddfod on music in Wales, he said: 'Beyond the fact of its enabling the singers to show what they are capable of doing with a piece they have studied incessantly for six months and nothing else, I should say the Eisteddfod rather retards the progress of music in Wales than advances it. The Eisteddfod in its original state must have been a highly interesting and picturesque gathering, and I think if it were carried on on broader lines it might be beneficial. But as it exists at present, the purely competitive side seems to loom so largely as completely to overshadow everything else. I certainly do not go so far as to desire or consider necessary the abandonment of the Eisteddfod, but I feel that it might be made much more the means of cultivating the knowledge and appreciation of good music of all classes than it is at present. But quite apart from the competitive side, which I suppose would never be allowed to cease, really first-class orchestral concerts might be introduced into the scheme, which would give the people of Wales an insight into a sphere of the art which up to now is practically unknown to them.'

Dr. Cowen's criticism has provoked replies from many Welsh musicians which have appeared in the Western Mail:

Mr. D. W. EVANS said: 'Among the younger school of musicians in the Principality, the opinions of Dr. Cowen will meet with approval, though, personally, I would not be prepared to go as far as he did. But while we look upon the Eisteddfod as a national institution which has done an incalculable amount of service in fostering music, it has to be admitted that committees promoting these events might make a better selection of works for competition than they sometimes do. If gentlemen forming the committees became proof against advances made by composers and their friends for the inclusion of particular works, we should hear very much less of complaints such as Dr. Cowen has voiced.'

Mr. E. T. DAVIES, Merthyr, said: 'I think Dr. Cowen has given expression to much that is true concerning the state of things musical in Wales, but I cannot agree with him when he states that at Eisteddfodau there is no desire on the part of one competitor to listen to the efforts of others. I have generally observed that competitors take the keenest interest in the performances of their opponents, and it is nothing unusual to see them follow their copies closely and make notes of any slips or errors made. However different may be the views of various musicians and critics, one thing is certain, the musical section of the Welsh Eisteddfod wants reforming very badly if it is to be of any educational value to the nation. It is the educational aspect of the Eisteddfod that is not kept sufficiently to the front; rather, the Eisteddfod has come to be regarded as an easy and sure means of raising money for all sorts of purposes. A programme is drawn out often by people who know little or nothing about music, and as a draw to competitors such a programme is made up of hackneyed and often unworthy test-pieces of which competitors are heartily sick, but, unfortunately, they seem unable to resist the temptation of competing for the money prize. This mode of doing things means musical stagnation—more, it means deterioration, and as a Welsh musician I cannot help protesting against the prostitution of our honourable and national institution in this way. If only our chief Eisteddfodau, say six or eight of the largest in South Wales, would make a firm and lasting stand in this matter of selecting new, worthy, and interesting test-pieces at all times, I am convinced the smaller gatherings would follow and progress be the result.'

SCHOOL CHOIR COMPETITIONS IN SOUTH AFRICA.

NAMAQUALAND.—May 3, 4, 6, 7.

Mesklip Public School Choir (Miss Janet Klender) won the 'Namaqua' trophy. Callcott's 'Ye mariners of England' was the prescribed test. Mr. Arthur Lee, Departmental Instructor, adjudicated.

CERES, PIQUETBERG, AND TULBAGH.—May 13.

The eighth annual competition was held at Piquetberg. In the principal contest, 'Outspan' (Proudman) and 'Sabbath Bells' (Smart) were sung by Porterville (Miss J. A. van Schalkwyk) and Piquetberg (Miss N. P. de Villiers). The adjudicator, Mr. Arthur Lee, declared the result a tie.

GEORGE, MOSSEL BAY, AND OUDTSHOORN.—June 8, 9.

At the sixth contest open to mission schools in the above districts the following choirs sang:

George, Dutch Reformed Church.

Kretzen's Hope.

1st. Oudtshoorn.

2nd. Welbedacht.

The prescribed test was Hatton's 'Song should breathe of scents and flowers.' Mr. Arthur Lee adjudicated.

PETERBOROUGH.

The eighth annual festival of the Co-operative Choral Association (Midland section) will be held on September 24. Dudley Buck's 'Hymn to Music' has been selected as a test-piece for choirs of 40 voices and under; the second test is left to individual choice. The solo-singing tests are Haydn's 'On mighty pens' (soprano), Handel's 'Father of Heaven' (contralto), 'How vain is man' (tenor), and Haydn's 'Rolling in foaming billows' (bass). Mr. S. Filmer Rook will adjudicate.

MANCHESTER.—October 1.

The ninth annual choral contest for mixed-voice choirs and church or chapel choirs will take place as usual at the Zoological Gardens, Belle Vue. The programme includes solo-singing competitions in four classes, and it states that 'The adjudicators will be gentlemen of repute in the musical world.'

THE PIANIST'S HAND.

Prevalent among pianists is the idea that you cannot play well unless you have a special sort of hand. This is a mistake. Provided you have four fingers and a thumb, and can stretch an octave comfortably, your hand is quite good. A pianist's excellence depends not upon the shape of the hand, but upon the conditions of all the muscles in the hand and arm. The "Brain to Keyboard" System trains every one of these muscles to perfection, and keyboard drudgery is entirely done away with. A full explanation is given in the illustrated Book, "Light on Pianoforte Playing," sent post-free to any pianist on application.

ANTONIO STRADIVARI HIS LIFE AND WORK (1644-1737)

BY

W. Henry Hill, Arthur F. Hill, F.S.A.,
and Alfred E. Hill.

A NEW AND CHEAPER EDITION.

This Book contains the whole of the original text and most of the illustrations, with the difference that the coloured plates have been replaced by photographic reproductions. On the other hand, however, it includes an additional illustration in colours, by way of frontispiece, of the celebrated Stradivari Violin, known as "The Messie."

In reviewing the earlier edition, The Times said: "That the authors were well qualified for the task is plain. They belong to a family in which violin making has been traditional for generations, they have been aided by the family lore and guided by wide and varied experience. Thus equipped, they have devoted themselves to a careful examination and comparison of the great maker's instruments, and the list cited justifies the conclusion that there can be few which have escaped their notice." The same journal refers to the book as "the most important contribution yet made to the history of the great fiddle-maker and his work."

A NOTE TO PIANO STUDENTS.

Remember that a Correspondence Course of THE EHREMYER SYSTEM of PIANOFORTE SIGHT-PLAYING will considerably augment your usual studies. The Course enables the pianist to play at first sight any piece which he is technically able to master. The practice involved takes about Fifteen Minutes daily, and in three months a proficiency can be attained which could not otherwise be attained without years of practising for many hours daily. Send for Booklet, Mr. L. M. EHREMYER, 27, Chancery Lane, W.C.

MR. THOMAS BEECHAM.

No other musical enterprise of recent years attracted such wide attention as that launched upon the musical world by Mr. Thomas Beecham in the spring of this year. Mr. Beecham had indeed already achieved distinction by his skilful orchestral conducting, and his pertinacity in bringing forward comparatively unknown orchestral and choral works of native and foreign composers. In constructing his programmes he seemed to give no thought to their possible popularity or drawing power. He was content to take great pains to prepare the music and to leave the rest to the public. Amongst the British composers thus encouraged we may mention Delius (whose 'Sea Drift' and 'Mass of life' were given first performances in London), Vaughan Williams, Arnold Bax, Balfour Gardiner, Norman O'Neill (of 'Blue Bird' fame), Frederic Austin, Holbrooke, W. H. Bell and others.

But the presentation of a series of operas at Covent Garden, the home of a powerful and well-established opera syndicate, whose practical monopoly of grand opera in London was thus boldly challenged, was a far greater business. The list of works announced included 'Elektra' (Strauss), 'L'Enfant Prodigue' (Debussy), 'Tristan' (Wagner), 'Hänsel and Gretel' (Humperdinck), 'Carmen' (Bizet), 'The village Romeo and Juliet' (Delius), and 'Ivanhoe' (Sullivan), and they were all performed. 'Elektra,' as all the world knows, was the greatest attraction, and whatever opinions were held as to the art-value of this remarkable work, the performances under Mr. Beecham's own direction, firmly established his reputation as an operatic conductor. This Covent Garden season was followed by a summer season of Opéra-comique at His Majesty's Theatre, where a series of operas was presented with lavish expenditure and perfection of ensemble that still further enhanced Mr. Beecham's reputation. Not the least noteworthy feature of this season was that all the operas were performed in English, and that nearly all the artists were British.

And now a long season of autumn opera is announced to be given at Covent Garden from October to Christmas. For this series the orchestra has been augmented, two separate choruses have been trained, and many of the most experienced native and foreign operatic artists have been engaged. Where did Mr. Beecham get the training to enable him to cope with these onerous and difficult tasks, and where did he get the ease and mastery he exhibits? The answer to the first of these questions is that he has had no musical training of the academic kind, and that his previous experience of conducting opera at least has been slight. His success is derived from the fact that he has great natural capacity, and that the task of conducting is a congenial one.

Mr. Thomas Beecham was born near Liverpool on April 29, 1879 (or 1880, he is not sure which). During his childhood no special efforts were made to develop his musical faculties on the technical side, but from the seventh to the ninth year of his age an elaborate orchestration possessed by his father was his almost daily delight. This instrument had an extensive repertory, including long extracts from Wagner's operas. Thus the eager young listener made the intimate acquaintance of the most modern harmonies and musical effects while his mind was receptive and plastic. The consciousness of the great influence this exceptional experience had upon his future career induces Mr. Beecham to maintain that the more usual plan of studying the chronological development of music is a mistake. He would reach the classic formalists—Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven—through the modern and advanced composers. If in youth attention is given only to the archaic, the taste is unduly biased, and later music is judged by a narrow standard. As in music so in philosophy: he would begin with Nietzsche and proceed to Bacon. Mr. Beecham contends, and surely with much truth, that a great proportion of the people who attend musical performances never really get sufficiently acquainted with fine artistic works to hear the music to which they listen. They do not catch the harmonies, the subtleties, or even the broader features, but simply some of the more superficial qualities.

In due time Master Thomas was sent to Rossall School (Lancashire), and he worked his way up to the 'sixth,' in which form he spent the last two years of his school life. Whilst at this excellent establishment he had pianoforte lessons, and some intermittent lessons in composition from Dr. Sweeting. His next educational step was to Wadham College, Oxford, where he read with the laudable and interesting intention of gaining a double-first in classics and history. But before a year had passed he concluded that he had assimilated enough of this sort of education whilst at Rossall and, perhaps with a feeling that coming events cast their shadow before, he withdrew from the University. Whilst at Oxford he did not attempt serious musical study. A few lessons in harmony and composition from Dr. Varley Roberts served to convince him that he was not made the right way to appreciate the usual English methods of approaching these subjects.

After Wadham, Mr. Beecham, in 1899, whilst he was nineteen (or twenty) years of age, returned to his father's residence at Huyton, near Liverpool. Here his cravings to conduct were gratified. He founded an amateur orchestra, which was liberally assisted by members of the Hallé Orchestra on important occasions. This experience culminated on an occasion during the mayoralty of his father,

Mr. Joseph Beecham. At an entertainment given by the Mayor, a full professional orchestra was engaged, and Dr. Richter was to conduct. But that great man fell ill suddenly, and young Beecham, with remarkable courage, not to say audacity, stepped into the breach. There were no full-scores available, but this occasioned the youth no dismay, for, gifted with an exceptionally good memory, he knew by heart all the pieces to be performed. The following were the chief items in the programme:

Symphony, C minor	- - -	Beethoven.
Overtures { 'Meistersinger'	- - -	Wagner.
{ 'Tannhäuser' }
Symphony 'Pathétique'	- - -	Tchaikovsky. and a work by Berlioz. The success of this event gave the budding conductor confidence, but it did not immediately fructify, for he did nothing with music for the next two or three years. Then, in 1902, he came to London with the idea of gaining more experience as a conductor. At that time Mr. Kelson Truman was organizing a touring opera company, and Mr. Beecham was introduced to him as a candidate for the conductor's post. Mr. Truman asked whether Mr. Beecham knew the operas to be done, and the reply took the convincing form of the candidate playing from memory selections from the works to be performed. Mr. Beecham's recollections of this tour are pleasant, inasmuch as he gained so much valuable experience. But there were difficulties fairly often, some of which were owing to the inconvenient thirst of many members of the orchestra. They were in the habit of taking a bar's rest before the performance began. After the tour Mr. Beecham retired into complete obscurity for about a twelve-month, and devoted himself to composition. Three operas—two of which were to English words (the libretto of one was also by Mr. Beecham), and one to Italian words—were the fruit of this period of seclusion. These works have never been performed, and the composer does not appear sanguine that they will be. The score of one is lost, but no doubt at a pinch Mr. Beecham could write every note of it from memory. What if the enemy (if there is one) got hold of this score and performed it? Asked whether he has composed anything in classic form, Mr. Beecham states that once he spent three weeks in trying to compose the first movement of a sonata, and this effort persuaded him that this form of composition at least was not in his line. In 1904, Mr. Beecham went to the Continent and heard much music, and in 1905 he returned to England determined to renew his experiences as a conductor. He gave a trial concert with the Queen's Hall Orchestra, the programme of which consisted of 18th century music, mainly of the French and Italian schools. This, to his astonishment, was warmly welcomed in critical quarters, but although pressed to give further concerts he did not at the time respond. In 1906 he resolved to form an orchestra for his own purposes, and in this way the New Symphony Orchestra came into being. A series of concerts was announced, and given with at least musical success. The Orchestra was increased in numbers in 1907, and again in 1908, and its performances of works not otherwise to be heard in London occasioned great interest. In 1909 there was unfortunate disagreement, and conductor and band parted. The next step was the formation of a totally new band styled the Beecham Symphony Orchestra, which is now also the opera orchestra. Its services are exclusively engaged by Mr. Beecham during about eight months of the year, and it is claimed that it is now the most employed orchestra in Europe. Sunday concerts are part of the autumn scheme at Covent Garden. This suggests a strenuous seven-day week for the orchestral players. But Mr. Beecham, alive to this disadvantage, states that other orchestras will be engaged for the purpose of these concerts.

Mr. Beecham's experience of foreign and native operatic singers leads him to the generalization that in this country there are too many musicians and too few artists. The oratorio and the song obsess our singers and fix a non-dramatic style. Think how many of our best-known singers never learn anything but a limited repertory of songs, in studying the interpretation of which they will spend as much time as would suffice to enable them to learn an operatic part. It is otherwise abroad. There the ruts of a singer's training all lead to opera. Until we have an opera company in every fair-sized town, we cannot educate our singers to become dramatic artists. American singers often succeed in fitting the demands of the situation because they have the foresight to obtain training in quarters where opera is the atmosphere.

That Mr. Beecham has no lack of faith in the potentiality of native vocalists is obvious from the fact that this year he has afforded them opportunities on an unprecedented scale. He speaks warmly of their abilities as singers, and is encouragingly optimistic as to the future.

A conductor's skill is perhaps better gauged at rehearsals than at performances. From the standpoint of the technique of conducting, the welding process is even more interesting than the finished product. Observation at Mr. Beecham's rehearsals enables one to account for his success. First, he is alert, confident, and cool—all qualities that keep steady that very unstable equilibrium the modern full orchestra, plus soloists and chorus singing from memory. Dante, had he known of this world, might have changed the venue of his 'Inferno' and his 'Paradise.' Then Mr. Beecham's rhythmic sensitiveness, keen ear, and exceptional memory are valuable and indispensable assets. To all this he adds the enthusiasm and vitality of youth—he is only thirty (or thirty-one) years of age.

Mr. Beecham speaks darkly and mysteriously of his schemes for next spring, which are to be divulged in a few weeks. Asked his opinion as to the Hammerstein grand opera scheme, which is now apparently taking definite shape, he generously wished it success. At least it may provide a comfortable opera house for some one else to fill!

The possibilities of establishing national opera in this country have been discussed ad nauseam. The ideal is the hope and despair of the musical patriot. But no one will be disposed to deny that Mr. Beecham's bold and remarkable enterprise has brought realization many steps nearer than it appeared to be a year ago.

ELGAR'S VIOLIN CONCERTO.

By ERNEST NEWMAN.

In the old days it was de rigueur for almost every instrumental composer who was worth his salt to write a concerto; even Chopin felt himself compelled to produce two, though the orchestra in itself had no attraction for him. Latterly, however, the form seems to have dropped a little out of fashion among the bigger men. The explanation probably is two-fold: on the one hand the modern composer rather resents the prominence necessarily given to the violinist or pianist in his work, and is uncertain how to harmonize the just claims of the soloist with his own freedom and sincerity of conception. On the other hand, instrumental music has mostly run of late on poetic rather than abstract lines, and the concerto has had to suffer some of the neglect that has befallen its bigger brother the symphony. Strauss wrote a Violin sonata when he was young, but we can hardly imagine him taking up the concerto or the symphonic form now. We cannot think of Debussy and a concerto at the same moment. The only living composer of distinction, in fact, who has hitherto done something to keep the concerto form alive is Sibelius, with the Violin concerto he published a few years ago. Now Elgar, fresh from his remarkable success with the symphony, has taken up the somewhat neglected form, and the result is a Violin concerto (Op. 61) that will be performed for the first time by Mr. Kreisler at a Philharmonic concert on November 10 next. It is peculiarly fitting, after all, that Elgar should write a concerto for the violin, for it is an instrument of which he has had a thorough practical knowledge for many years. He had at one time, indeed, an idea of coming out as a solo violinist, and studied under Pollitzer, in his twenties, with that end in view. One of his early works (Op. 24) is a set of five 'Études caractéristiques' for the violin, designed to exploit certain capabilities of the instrument.

Any attempt at a full critical estimate before performance of a work of this magnitude, containing so much that is new and dazzling in the writing for the solo instrument, would be an impertinence. One may, however, express the delight one has had in reading and re-reading it, and one's own feeling that it is wholly worthy of the composer of the Symphony that has been pleasing us all so hugely for the last couple of years. It will probably affect its hearers, as that did, with the sense that new life has been breathed into an old form that was in danger of decay, and that everywhere the personality of its author speaks through it. Elgar has now a style, a personal idiom, that no one who knows his work in the mass can mistake. The present Concerto could not possibly be attributed to anyone else. It is signed 'Edward Elgar' in a thousand places—one might almost say in every bar; withal there is no repetition of anything that has been said in any previous work of his. A man's voice can be the same from year to year, yet the things he utters with it may be infinite. I lay a little stress on the point, because the very pronounced character of Elgar's present style—melodic, harmonic, and rhythmic—may lead a superficial hearer to think here and there in the concerto that he catches an echo of the Symphony. There is, as a matter of fact, a similarity of idiom—that is inevitable; but there is no repetition of idea, just as any two of Balzac's or Meredith's novels tell a different story, though the prose style has the same strongly-marked characteristics in both.

The Concerto—which, by-the-way, is in the key of B minor, and in three movements—is scored for a small orchestra as orchestras go nowadays, and so will be practicable for bands of moderate size. It is scored simply for strings, two each of the wood-wind (flutes, oboes, clarinets and bassoons)—with contra-fagotto ad libitum—four horns, two trumpets, three trombones—with tuba ad libitum—and timpani. The three movements correspond to the usual Allegro, Andante, and Allegro, with some distinctive features of their own; there is no Cadenza, for example, in the first movement, while that in the Finale is accompanied by a portion of the orchestra (strings divisi, horns and timpani). It is written out in full, of course, and not left in any way to the discretion of the soloist.

The thematic material of the first movement is presented very pithily. The second subject is a distinct theme that preserves its individuality unchanged in each one of its reappearances. There is no first subject, in the strict sense of the word; we have instead four thematic fragments that enjoy practically equal power throughout the whole development of the movement. At their first appearance, however, they are woven into one continuous melody. It occupies merely some twenty bars, and the first effect, as I have implied, is that of a single theme; yet each of the four limbs of it, as it were, has a life of its own, and, in the development that follows, is made to generate or branch out of all or any of the others with perfect ease and naturalness. The preliminary statement of the thematic material is thus masterly in its force and concision; while in all the subsequent development there is not a trace of hesitation, of labour, or of text-bookishness; it all grows naturally and logically. The form is thus extraordinarily satisfying; one has a delighted sense of an inevitable and harmonious evolution, like that of a complex organism. Here are the four themes that between them make up the first-subject group, in the order in which they occur in the orchestral introduction:

No. 1a. *Allegro. ♩ = 100.
nobilmente.*

mf
con Ped.

No. 1b. sf dim.

No. 1c. f

No. 1d. a tempo. fp

Ped. * Ped. * Ped. * Ped. *

They are briefly stated, the last being enlarged upon slightly, and then we are taken without a break into the second subject. At its first entry it has a little echo after its real constituent phrases, and its harmonization differs slightly from that of its later and fuller statement, which, therefore, it will be better to quote here (although, as will be seen, it only occurs in this form after the entry of the solo violin):

No. 2. a tempo. semplice. pp dolce. a tempo.

On its first appearance in the orchestra it is made the text for some ravishing dialogue between the wood-wind and strings. Later on, however, when the soloist takes it up, it will be seen to be a violinist's theme pur sang. It is one of the loveliest snatches of melody Elgar has ever written, and one may safely prophesy that it will long haunt the memory of whoever hears it. It is the perfect feminine counterpart and complement of the masculine themes in the first-subject group. These are now repeated (with the exception of No. 1c). Then the solo violin enters in most effective style—all the more effective for its unexpectedness and its modesty. The orchestra is obviously about to wind up the preliminary exposition with a final delivery of No. 1a; but before it can finish, the solo violin takes the word out of its mouth as it were. The first entry of the violin is thus in a form that the older school, both of composers and of players, would have objected to as drawing insufficient attention to itself. There is no flourish, no stepping into the centre of the stage and waiting for the limelight; its first utterance is merely the end of a sentence begun by the orchestra; but the quality of the phrase (it is marked Molto largamente e nobilmente) and the colour it acquires from being set in the lowest part of the violin compass, make the utterance one of the utmost gravity and the most arresting force.

It would serve no useful purpose to describe in mere verbal detail the course of the rest of the movement. Nos. 1a, b, c and d, are developed in all kinds of ways and with many varieties of mood; No. 2 almost always keeps its exquisite gentleness of appeal, except for a moment or two, such as that in which the wood-wind and strings gather it up in mighty waves, while the horns tear their way downward through the tissue; or a later moment in which the violin soars above it passionately, though here it almost instantly quietsens down into the sensitive mood that we usually associate with it. There is comparatively little episodic matter in the movement, the great bulk of it being evolved from the themes I have quoted above. As in the Symphony, we always get the feeling that we are not listening to mere music-making, not witnessing a mere attempt to fill a conventional form, but following up a long and always interesting trail of human experience; all this music has been lived before it was put on paper. It all has the same highly-strung, nervous quality as the Symphony; and in the naturalness of the sequence of its moods, the ebb and flow of passion in it, it gives us the same impression as its predecessor of the thinking controlling the form, instead of the form controlling the thinking. The writing for the violin is brilliant enough to satisfy the most ardent virtuoso; but, needless to say, there is not a bar of it put in for merely violinistic effect; the soloist is there in the service of the music, not the music in the service of the soloist. The interest of the movement keeps piling up to the end. The solo violin mounts up and up in eager phrases; No. 1a comes out in firm outlines for the last time, and two or three curt, incisive chords clinch it all like the final word of demonstration in a long and close argument.

The Andante is largely founded on a beautiful, song-like theme of the simplest possible character, the savour of which may be had from the following quotation :

Alternating with this is a theme that had better be quoted, not in its original form, but in the shape in which it grows to considerable importance in the sequel :

No. 4, and another song-like melody that is associated with it—the outline of it alone can be quoted here :

—are subjected to some variation, whereas No. 3, except for a bar or two, always preserves the same air of touching simplicity. It is the orchestra's property each time, the solo violin mostly having a counterpoint to it that sometimes occupies an inner part and at others soars above it. There are passion and strength in the middle section of the movement, but they are closed in on both sides by the tranquil No. 3. For the violin there is some exquisite cantabile writing and some expressive arabesque. The movement grows more and more thoughtful and refined as it nears its end ; and, as in the Allegro, we are struck by the sincerity and the emotional continuity of it.

From the dream-world of the Andante we get back to very vigorous real life again in the Finale. The orchestral tissue is at first mostly composed of a succession of rich and solid harmonies, over which the solo violin scuds about in rapid, brilliant figures. The themes proper to the movement are all of a breezy character ; they cannot all be quoted here, but the most important of them :

and :

will serve to show the type. The ornamentation that entwines this last in the solo violin is especially rich and ornate, and will tax all the player's powers.

Nos. 6 and 7 are worked out with splendid fire and energy, but at length these ebullient spirits are checked, a new mood coming into the music with the advent of the noble No. 4 from the second movement. It is worked out in lofty style, then gives way for a moment to the earlier and breezier matter—with the solo violin striding along high above it ; and we settle down by slow stages into the Cadenza. This, so far from being made a mere medium of display, is one of the most thoughtful and moving sections of the Concerto. As already stated, it is mostly accompanied. The strings are divided practically throughout, the firsts playing con sordini, the seconds pizz.-trem. The direction for the latter effect is, 'The chords should be "drummed" softly with three or four fingers.' The effect will be novel—as of distant Æolian harps murmuring above and below the solo violin. For thematic material it draws on the first and second movements. First of all we have No. 1*a* given out slowly and meditatively by the orchestra, the violin answering with No. 1*d* in the same subdued spirit. It ends with a fine rhetorical gesture, breaks off into arabesque, and resumes as thoughtfully as before with No. 1*d*, which merges into a hint of the second subject of the first movement (No. 2). This theme is not further pursued, however, until after some rapid and expressive work in the violin, that is really a fantasy upon the two long-drawn harmonies in the orchestra. Finally No. 2 comes out in fuller form, followed shortly afterwards by the strains of No. 4, with No. 2 as its cadence. No. 1*a* tries to assert itself, agitato, in the orchestra, but the violin takes it up Nobilmente e espressivo, and, as in the first movement, finishes off the phrase in the gravest and most noble style, like a philosopher calming some one's fever and fret with a single sentence. The Cadenza, it will thus be seen, is an interlude of serious and profound contemplation, as it were the soul retiring into itself and seeking its strength inwardly, in the midst of the swirling life all around it. This life is partly resumed for a moment when the Cadenza is over, but the noble No. 4 soon begins to dominate the music again. Catching something of the spirit of this, No. 7 next appears in broader outlines, followed by No. 6, also in an expanded and ennobled form, the violin playing it in massive chords over the orchestral accompaniment. Seven bars of Coda bring the movement to an end, in the key of B major.

So much for what one can make of the Concerto from the score alone. One looks forward eagerly to hearing it in all its wealth of orchestral colour, and with the brilliance or the pathos that the solo violin will give to it. And now we are all the more hungry for the second symphony.

RHYTHM.

By T. H. YORKE TROTTER.

That rhythmic movement is a necessity to mankind can easily be seen if we cast our thoughts back to the time when the human race was in its infancy. Primitive man had neither the strength nor the agility to enable him to compete in the struggle for existence with the huge creatures that existed in times long before historic periods. His chances of survival lay in one thing only—his superior intelligence—which enabled him to combine with his fellow-men and thus to multiply his power. Now combination is impossible without rhythmic movement. To enable two men to pull down the branch of a tree with which to fashion a shaft for a sharpened stone, it was necessary that both should pull at the same time. All combined labour demands a certain rhythm among the workers, without which their efforts would be futile. And so in the struggle for existence rhythmic movement became a necessity, and the feeling for rhythm was deeply implanted in mankind.

Another fact must also be noticed—movement is the expression of emotion. A child will show his feelings by dancing, clapping his hands, and other movements. Motion of some kind is the primitive way of expressing the feelings. It is therefore without surprise that we find the first art of any kind to consist in the rhythmic motion of the dance. Dances were and still remain the chief mode of expression among savage peoples, and it is to this love of rhythmic motion that we owe one of the two elements in our art of music. The time element always has been and always will be the chief means in music by which our emotional nature is touched. Without it music would be but a cold and lifeless thing without form and void.

The importance, therefore, of rhythm in music cannot be over-estimated; it is indeed the essence of the art. And yet this most important factor has been strangely neglected. We talk often as if tone and not rhythm was the prevailing feature. Even the word 'rhythm' does not always convey the same meaning. Sometimes it is used as synonymous with time: sometimes it means a balance of phrases, while often it comprehends everything in music that has to do with motion. One writer, with a somewhat perverse ingenuity, uses the word in two senses, distinguishing between them by writing the one with a capital, the other with a small 'r.' And yet the meaning attached to the word as used by writers on other subjects than music should apply with ease to its use in music. Rhythm is the periodic quality in motion, that is to say, whenever there is motion in which there is recurrence or design, there is rhythm. This definition has been given by Miss Glyn in her books 'The Rhythmic Conception of Music' and 'Analysis of the Evolution of Musical Form,' and it is one which should be quite sufficient for any purpose. Now music is the art which consists of rhythmic motion combined with tone, and therefore to see what rhythm in music is, it will be necessary to observe the ways in which recurrence in motion may take place. This may happen in three ways, as Miss Glyn has shown: (1) in a balance of phrases and sections; (2) in the rise and fall in melody and in the motion up to and down from a climax of any description; (3) in the motion to and from a central point called the key. The rhythm of corresponding phrases owes its origin to the fact that it is natural to mankind to group sounds into small sections and to group sections into larger divisions. Without such grouping there could be no art of music as we have it, for there could be no design nor recurrence. And so we get both groupings of beats making bars, in which the first beat bears an accent either given or implied, and grouping of accents making phrases. The number of accents in each phrase is not a fixed thing, but one that varies considerably. The most easy phrase to understand is the one that has in it four strong accents, and some writers have thought that it is the normal phrase and that all others are variations of it. But this view ignores the fact that in primitive music phrases of two, three, and even five accents are by no means uncommon. To attempt to explain a phrase of three accents by saying it really has four accents, but one is omitted, is surely a very far-fetched way of looking at the matter. The fact is that the length of the phrase simply depends on the effect to be produced. The grouping of a large number of accents might make the effect unintelligible, but as long as the music can be comprehended the number of accents matters little.

Some writers, in an endeavour to find an unit to serve as a basis for musical composition, have split up the phrase into small sections, the smallest of which they call a 'measure' or a 'motive.' Now, no doubt it is possible in many cases to find such an unit, but to base a theory of rhythm on its appearance is to misunderstand the nature of the art. The only standard of time which is strict is the bar, with its feeling of accent on the first beat, and it is the business of the composer to weave round this standard designs which vary indefinitely. Should we acknowledge the existence of a rhythmic unit, such as the measure, we would at once make music a mechanical thing and spoil the free flow of sound which constitutes its main charm. Any attempt to say with certainty how a composition should be performed, by the mechanical device of splitting it up into fragments and making exact repetitions, as regards accent, of small sections, would be to draw the life-blood out of the art. It is variety that charms, not monotony; and the art of music consists in achieving unity with as much variety as is compatible with the nature of the composition. The mistake of trying to make music a matter of exact proportion is one that was made by the Greeks, with whom practice in the Arts was a long way ahead of æsthetic theory. What is important for us is to recognise that mathematical accuracy only fetters the art and prevents its free flow. We must therefore expect considerable time variety in compositions of any value whatever; indeed, one of the main points of difference between what is called good and bad music consists in the fact that in the one there is either variety of accent or phrases of varying lengths, while in the other monotony is the prevailing feature. And a study of the music of different countries shows us that it is just among those nations that are strong in rhythm that the greatest variety prevails. The habit of dancing in a free style invariably leads to the love of rhythmic variety, while the strictest rhythmic form is found among people of more quiet habits. Thus we arrive at a law that where attention chiefly centres on time and all that appertains thereto, there will be great time variety, while in cases where time-effects are in the background there will be stiffness of outline.

Variety is gained by either contradicting the strict accent by means of syncopations or by making the phrases of unequal lengths. Where the one is present, in all probability the other will be absent, but without one or the other the music would be felt to be dull. Another device not uncommonly found in the works of great composers is obtained by means of what is called shifting accent. It is a well-known fact that the final chord in a piece ought to fall on the strongest accent, that is to say, on the first beat. But it will be constantly found that in the same piece the cadence-chord comes sometimes on the third, sometimes on the first beat. This is caused by the fact that there is a subtle change or shifting of accent. Probably for this reason composers were in the habit of writing their compositions in shorter bar-lengths than seems to us right. Three-four time is often used where six-eight would seem more suitable, but it would be wrong to assume that the accents should be invariably those of the six-eight time. What really happens is that six-eight time should have been written with half-bars in certain places. The device of changing the number of beats for one bar only was rarely used by classical composers, and so we get signatures that do not quite represent the actual effect. It is highly important that this rhythmic feature should be understood, for otherwise we would get performances either so stiff that they distort the character of the music, or with false accents in some places. The ideal performance is one in which the rhythmic outline is apparent through frequent variation.

It may be objected that without some definite standard of rhythm, performance can only be left to the taste of the performer, who may not possess the capacity to see what was intended by the composer. But it would certainly be a mistake to set up a mechanical standard for fear of the bad results arising from the want of the proper feeling for rhythm. Music must speak for itself, and to anyone who possesses the feeling for rhythm the true interpretation is obvious. What is wanted is a careful development of the time-sense in the child, and then there is no fear of incorrect performance.

The second way in which rhythm appears in music is in a rise and fall in the outline of a melody, making what is called by some writers the melodic curve. The best illustration of this rise and fall is found in the motion of the sea-waves; hence the name 'undulating' has been used for it, derived from 'unda,' a sea-wave. Now this rise and fall, like the wave motion, is never exact, but is also used with variety. And yet the rhythmic nature of this effect is evident, for the design shows itself throughout. Many of the most beautiful melodies of Mozart and Beethoven owe their effect to the subtle use of this rise and fall. In such cases there is not much time variety, for the essential feature is not one of time but of rhythmic movement up and down. Hence we get quite a new feature of melody, producing quite new effects.

Akin to this rise and fall in melodic outline, we get a rise and fall of the force-outline, e.g., a long crescendo up to a point, followed by a long diminuendo. Such effects must be classed as rhythmic, for they consist of motion to and from a central point. In modern music they are of the highest importance, for the additional power obtained by the increase of tone in such instruments as the pianoforte and the use of larger orchestras, gives to composers means of obtaining results that were impossible in the earlier days of the art. And so in modern music we obtain the principle of climax—that is to say, a culminating point in force-outline. Sometimes the climax is gained by a series of curves, each one bigger than the last, till the highest point is reached. Designs of this kind cannot fail to have a great influence on types of form, for the interest of the piece is based not so much on formal divisions as on the management of the details, so as to lead up to one great central point.

The third way in which the rhythmic principle appears in music is in the motion to and from a central point called the key-centre. It would appear that we owe our tonality, as well as our phrase-form, to the old folk-dance. For where a number of persons are engaged in a free dance it is necessary to have points of repose, obvious to every one, so that the dancers may know exactly where to begin a new figure. The music will therefore follow the lines of the dance, and will contain phrases corresponding to the sections of the dance and pauses on important tones. Now without a clearly-defined tonalitive system such devices would be impossible. A key-centre is the principal point of repose formed by the insistence on a tone on an accented beat, and by the approach to that tone from below by a semitone. Similarly the importance of the fifth as a subsidiary resting-place would soon appear. Hence we find in early examples of folk-dance tunes a well-defined tonic, contrasting with the vague tonality of the church modes. That this would be likely to be the case is clear when we consider the different uses to which the music was put. Clear tonality and phrase-form are essential to define dance-figures, but in the music of the church vagueness was not a disadvantage; indeed, it was essential in order to distinguish religious art from the dance-tunes of the people. Accordingly between the two kinds of music there was a great gulf fixed, which was not bridged over till the rise of instrumental music made a new art. What is called absolute music requires well-defined phrase-form and clear tonality, otherwise it would be impossible for the listener to understand it. Accordingly we find that the principle of a key-centre, to and from which motion is made, was strongly insisted on by the composers to whom we owe our types of form. The key is made obvious, indeed to our ears a great deal too obvious, and the motion from the key is only to such keys as will strengthen and not weaken the feeling for the principal key. And so we get the conventional arrangement of a modulation to the key of the dominant with the return to the tonic. As progress in the art was made, the feeling for the key-centre became stronger, and insistence on it not so necessary, till at the present time modulations are made to remote keys even at the beginning of the piece. And yet it would seem that the feeling for a key-centre is essential in absolute music, otherwise there can be no sense of rest or finality at the conclusion of the work, while the want of some kind of formal type would be fatal; so this rhythmic principle of motion to and from a key-centre is still as essential to the art as it was many years ago.

A close analysis of these three kinds of rhythm will show us their enormous importance. Without the feeling for the rhythm of phrase-form, the student can make no progress either as composer or executant; the rhythm of the rise and fall has an immense influence on the effects that can be produced; while the rhythm of the motion to and from a key-centre gives us our principles of tonality. As the sense of rhythm is at the root of all our feelings, it would seem as if musical education should begin by a careful training of the feeling for rhythm, and should proceed to build on this foundation.

Occasional Notes.

Among the centenaries of the year, that of the birth of Joseph Alfred Novello deserves honourable mention because of the incalculable influence of the main achievement of his life. He was the pioneer of cheap music in the world. No doubt this boon to the advancement of music would have come from some other source at a later period, just as the steam engine would have come if Watt and Stephenson had never been born. But this does not lessen the merit of Alfred Novello's foresight and determined courage in venturing to do what no one else at the time thought of doing. Joseph Alfred Novello was born on August 12, 1810, and he died at Genoa on July 16, 1896. He was one of Vincent Novello's eleven children. In his early manhood he was a bass singer, and his services were much in request. The story of his career as a music publisher is too interesting to suffer compression here. It will be found in the existing edition of 'A Short History of Cheap Music,' published in 1887 by Messrs. Novello, and it will receive due recognition in the later history of the firm of Novello & Co., which will be issued early next year—the centenary of the establishment of the firm.

Dr. Richard Strauss's new opera 'Der Rosenkavalier' is nearly finished. To render his music more in keeping with the light character of Hugo von Hoffmannsthal's text, he has employed a more simply-constituted orchestra than in his recent works. It contains, besides the usual string orchestra, two flutes, piccolo, two oboes, cor anglais, clarinet in E flat, two clarinets in B flat, basset-horn, two bassoons, contra-bassoon, four horns, three trumpets, three trombones, tuba, two harps, celesta, and the usual percussion. The merry, rococo style of the libretto gives the composer an opportunity to compete with his late namesake the great 'Waltz-king.' He has previously, in 'Feuersnot,' and even in 'Also sprach Zarathustra,' given evidence of the capacity to write charming music in waltz rhythms. The most recent news of his dispute with the authorities of the Dresden Theatre is that the difficulties have been smoothed over, and that the opera will be produced early in 1911.

The numerous treasures in the shape of autographs and personal relics of great musicians belonging to the Kaiserliche Königliche Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde, in Vienna, a collection which has not hitherto been well housed, will presently be placed in a series of fireproof rooms in the new Wiener Konzerthaus, now approaching completion. The skull of Joseph Haydn is perhaps unique among the objects of interest in the collection. The Society also possesses a number of Beethoven souvenirs, including one of the sketch-books, his last medicine spoon, the key to his coffin and the autograph score of the 'Eroica' Symphony. There is also a leaf of music containing autographs of Beethoven, Schubert and Brahms. On one side is a song by Beethoven, on the other a song by Schubert; Brahms, when he presented the leaf to the Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde added a dedication. The collection also includes numerous autograph scores and letters of Mozart's; one of the diaries kept by Schubert in his youth; and manuscripts of many other composers from the earliest times down to the present day. In the new building accommodation will also be provided for the Society's large collection of musical instruments, in which the development from primitive beginnings to the achievements of the present day is well illustrated. A special room is assigned or the exhibition of busts and portraits of famous musicians.

The magnificent series of concerts given at the Winter Gardens, Bournemouth, under the direction of Mr. Dan Godfrey, is well known. A 'Complete list of works' performed at the 910 symphony and classical concerts given between October 14, 1895, and May 12, 1910, has just been issued. The total number of separate works performed amounts to 1,263. In the list of 308 composers represented, 129 of the names are British, and to these names 454 works are attached. Some further statistics are provided: for instance, that 147 performances of symphonies by Beethoven were given. 'Concert centenaries' have been signalled by special works and an increased orchestra. For the four-hundredth concert, Tchaikovsky's 'Francesca da Rimini' was chosen; for the five-hundredth, Berlioz's 'Romeo and Juliet' Symphony and Strauss's 'Till Eulenspiegel.' We wonder what will be played at the thousandth. Of course the popularity of these concerts has been immense, and the reputation of the town has thereby been increased. There must be many holiday-makers who, uncertain in the choice of a resort, were induced to decide in favour of Bournemouth by the promise of its musical attractions. Brighton and Bridlington papers please copy.

Great news for those interested in opera! A daily contemporary has lately published a manifesto from a gentleman whom it describes as 'New York's best-known impresario,' to the effect that he is about to endow London with a new opera house 'to be devoted exclusively to grand opera, which is to be given all the year round.' As a compliment to London the house is to be called 'The London Opera House,' and any misgivings as to the appropriateness of this name will be speedily allayed by the announcement that 'his repertoire will be that of the French, Italian, and German schools.' He further says: 'it is the claim of my friends that in New York I popularised, democratised and vitalised opera, and it has occurred to me that something on the same lines . . . might be acceptable to the great English metropolis. No, I have never had any personal experience in London, but I have studied the field carefully.' H'm! We wonder whether these studies embraced the history of previous attempts and the efforts of previous entrepreneurs—a word best translated in this connection as undertakers! Our first national opera house was converted into a police station, our second into a music-hall, our third and fourth attempts never got as far as digging the foundations, for lack of support. Will this project end in a new drapery emporium or a cinematograph show? We do not wish to seem to scorn a well-intentioned enterprise, which may at least help to establish a habit of opera-going in our midst. Let us hope for the best.

Doctors have studied, or endeavoured to study, the effects of music upon the mentally afflicted, and there was an article upon this subject by Mr. Albert Visetti in a musical contemporary only last month. Far more interesting to the musician, however, is it to consider the effect of insanity upon music, and materials for this study are not lacking. Even amongst composers of high rank there are a few, such as Schumann and Macdowell, whose last compositions show traces of the fell disease to which they became a prey, and the writer of these lines is acquainted with other examples. But what are these traces; how does madness show itself in music? By wild harmonies and frantic passages? No, strange to say, by the very reverse characteristics: the absence of anything of this sort. It is common to speak of extreme, or shall we say ultra-modern music, as 'crazy' or 'mad,' yet the music written by those whose brain is really affected is usually devoid of any distinct feature whatever. It is like a bad organist's extemporization as much as anything: weak rhythm, weak melody (an echo of former better things), nothing left but—harmony. Curiously enough, whatever else the poor insane composer does he keeps a sub-conscious memory of chords and their resolutions. Passages—quick notes in general—he seems to abhor; his music is always slowish, but of no particular tempo, and the one characteristic which is hardest for even the sanest of us to avoid enforces the madman's music like a garment, that is—dulness.

The Classical Concert Society have issued a prospectus in which they undertake to give a third season of chamber concerts on the lines that have proved successful during the past two years. The amount of activity expended in the performance of chamber music in London increases every season, and at the same time chamber music itself is increasing in quantity and widening in scope. The works of Reger and Ravel, the latest effusions by young bloods of the Academy or College, the 'Cobbett' Fantasias, cry out for performance, and many are the trio and quartet parties, who, unable to scale great interpretative heights with Beethoven, are willing to secure attention by performing the new works. In many cases, no doubt, zeal on behalf of the unrecognized composer and the ideal of progress provide the chief stimulus. In this way many beautiful and powerful works get a hearing, and perhaps establish themselves in favour. But at the same time there are many to whom the experimental programme offers no attraction, and there are students to whom it is of no value and for their sake the classical masterpieces must be kept in full view. Among the societies who make it their first aim to supply this need, the Classical Concert Society stands foremost. It is the direct descendant of the Joachim Concert Committee, whose traditions it undertakes to uphold. For two seasons they have given, with the help of well-known performers, concerts of the highest artistic value, at which classical chamber music forms the greater part of the programmes. We now learn that the financial results were equally satisfactory. With this encouragement the Society have decided to increase their activity, and to give no fewer than twenty concerts during the coming season. The programmes of the ten that are to be given at Bechstein Hall before Christmas are already issued, together with the names of the artists engaged. At the first concert, which will take place on October 12, Fräulein Maria Philipp, Señor Pablo Casals and Mr. D. F. Tovey will appear in works by Bach, Beethoven, Schumann and Brahms.

Under the patronage of His Royal Highness The Grand Duke of Baden, four festival performances, devoted to compositions by J. S. Bach, will be given at Heidelberg during October 23-25 in commemoration of the jubilee of the Bachverein and the Akademischer Gesangverein. The Mass in B minor will be performed at the first concert (arranged, edited and conducted by Dr. Philipp Wolfrum). Herr Felix Mottl, from Munich, will direct the second concert, when the programme will include the Suite for flute and string orchestra (solo flute, Herr Wunderlich), the Concerto in C minor for two pianofortes (the soloists Messrs. Max Reger and Philipp Wolfrum), the E major Violin concerto (Professor Carl Flesch), the sixth 'Brandenburg' concerto, and the 'Bauernkantate.' At the third concert the first Organ sonata in E flat major, the 'Partita' in D minor for Violin solo, and the fifth 'Brandenburg' concerto in D major for pianoforte, flute, violin and string orchestra (soloists Messrs. Max Reger, Wunderlich and Carl Flesch) will be heard. The programme of the fourth and last concert will include the three Church cantatas 'Christus der ist mein Leben,' 'O Ewigkeit, du Donnerwort' and 'Wachet auf.'

Now that the Copyright Commission has decided that the reproduction of a composition in the perforated-paper notation of the pianola is a breach of copyright, it is evident that the makers of these instruments, being forced into honesty, will ere long be giving commissions to composers. It is earnestly to be hoped that these latter will rise to the level of their unique opportunities. Fancy a pianoforte piece where you need not think of technical difficulty, fingering or number of notes! How truly noble would a concerto for pianola and orchestra sound! Better still, a duet for two pianolas, for then the really up-to-date composer would be able to have both the tonal scales (alas, that there are only two!) played simultaneously. We had thoughts of patenting this effect, but it were perhaps more generous to leave it to our youthful imitators of Debussy, Ravel and Co. (unlimited).

Mr. Henry Davey in a letter sent to the Brighton Herald says that 'there is an interesting article on Blackpool in this month's Musical Times which is of interest in connection with the Brighton Municipal Orchestra,' and he quotes Mr. Speelman as saying that whilst in former days musical comedy selections were wanted, the public now calls for Beethoven, Schubert, Wagner and Tchaikovsky. He draws attention to the reception which classical music gets at the Queen's Hall Promenade Concerts, and he asserts his belief that the best music is what the public likes best, 'so long as programmes are arranged with tact.' The editor of the Herald drily (if we may say so) administers a cold douche on these enthusiasms by pointing out that a recent 'Request' programme, performed by the Brighton Municipal Orchestra, did not contain the names of Bach, Haydn, Mozart or Beethoven. It is certainly a fact that popular audiences, once put into an amiable mood, are willing to applaud impartially good and indifferent music, especially when it is well played or sung. This expansive and frank appreciative capacity of ordinary musical folk is on the whole a good thing, and moreover it has the ring of sincerity in it. We have reason to be grateful that this capacity embraces the good music.

In the Competition Festival Record supplement we refer to the deeply regretted death of Miss Wakefield, and a portrait is also given with our present issue.

THE VIOLA.

By ARTHUR T. FROGGATT.

The Viola is the oldest member of the string quartet. A year or so ago its extinction was prophesied by someone whose name I forget. The idea was that its place would be taken by a second violoncello. Those who listened to the splendid playing of Mr. Lionel Tertis at the Incorporated Society of Musicians' Conference at Folkestone last winter, will possibly be slow to credit the prophecy. It seems to be forgotten by many that the very defect of the viola has come to be its chief virtue; and that to the fact that its strings are too heavy for the size of the body, its rich and sombre tone-colour is chiefly owing. The modern orchestra, with all its magnificence, is not so rich in varieties of tone-colour that it can afford to dispense with one of them; and a brief historical survey of the employment of the viola in orchestral and chamber-music will perhaps enable the student to decide the question of its probable abandonment.

In the days of viols, the tenor viol (mean viol, viola da braccio) must have proved a somewhat awkward instrument to manage. Too bulky to be held on the arm, it was supported on the knee, with its upper portion resting against the shoulder, the left hand being on a level with the head. It was nevertheless occasionally employed in considerable numbers. At the production of Monteverde's 'Orfeo' in 1607, at Mantua, the orchestra included ten tenor viols, as against two violins and two bass viols. But this was probably a very unusual arrangement. Nor was the tenor viol always employed in chamber-music. Of the nine three-part fantasies for viols, published by Orlando Gibbons about 1610, the first four are written for treble, mean and bass, but the remaining five are for two trebles and bass.

In the oratorios of Carissimi (1604-1674), no place is found for the viola, the accompaniments being written for two violins and bass. But in the second half of the 17th century the viola begins to assert its right to a recognised position in the orchestra. In the operas of Lulli (1633-1687), we find this instrument occupying its present place in the score, and even taking its share in the fugal entries of the Allegro movement of the overture.

The trio-sonatas of Corelli (1653-1713), are written for two violins and bass viol. They are forty-eight in number, and the viola does not appear in any of them. But when we come to the concertos, published in 1712, the case is different. In a note to Naumann's 'History of Music' (p. 533), Ouseley states that 'Corelli's concertos are scored for a quartet of two violins, viola and violoncello, besides two ripieno violin parts and a figured bass for the organ.' This statement is inaccurate, and suggests that Ouseley's knowledge of the concertos was derived from the London edition, edited by Dr. Pepusch and published by Walsh in 1730. In this edition the editor has put the viola into the concertino. But Corelli has written only three instruments for the concertino, namely, two violins and violoncello, to which the concerto grosso adds four others—two violins, viola and basso (these parts to be doubled at pleasure); in addition to which two harpsichords are required, one to accompany the concertino and the other the concerto grosso.

The compass of the viola part in these concertos extends from d to *e*²; but the fourth string is little employed, and its open note never once heard. The part is decidedly easier than any of the others. There are half-a-dozen shakes in the Largo of the first concerto: with this exception, semiquavers are somewhat rare, and more than two are never found in succession. There is no double-stopping, but in the Pastorale of the eighth Concerto the open G and its octave are sometimes sounded simultaneously (this, however, is the only movement in which the same thing occurs in the violin parts). The viola always has a real part, with the exception of a few passages, never more than a bar or two, in which it doubles the violoncello either in unison or at the octave (at the first entry of the Grave in the eighth Concerto, the viola doubles the first violin of the concertino for three notes only). Very occasionally, chiefly in the twelfth Concerto, the viola rises above all the other parts.

In the operas of Purcell there is no such obvious inferiority in the viola part as we find in the concertos of Corelli. This is true even of the first of the long series—'Dido and Æneas,' written about 1677. And when we come to the compositions of later years, we find a considerable advance. In 'King Arthur' (1691) the viola is no longer content to double the tenor part in the choruses, as in the earlier work, but exhibits a considerable degree of independence. I suppose that Purcell may have written more than one overture for this opera: at all events, one is extant, scored for two violins, two violas, two trumpets, and bass, in which the parts for the violas are precisely similar in character to those for the violins. It is worth noticing that the only double-stop occurring in the whole opera (in the final bar of a 'symphony' in the fifth act) is given to the viola (c—e). The music of 'Bonduca,' written in 1695, the year of the composer's untimely death, is very similar in the general character of the viola part to that of 'King Arthur.'

But in all chamber music, not only of the second half of the 17th century but also of the first half of the 18th century, the viola was very much neglected. In the case of every composer up to the time of Haydn, the instrumental trio was invariably written for two violins and bass. Telemann, indeed, in 1734, published some 'Scherzi melodici' for violin, viola and bass (which I have never seen); but this was quite contrary to the usual practice. Indeed, the only eminent musician of the period who made a special study of the viola, so far as I know, was J. H. Rolle, who, in 1741, entered the Court band at Berlin as a viola-player.

Bach cannot be accused of neglecting the viola. He constantly omits it from the accompaniments to vocal solos, according to the fashion of the time; but in choral work he expects from it nearly, if not quite, as much as from the first violins. In orchestral music he writes for violas even when violoncellos are omitted from the score.

With Handel it is very different. When he first came to England, he probably met with viola-players of somewhat limited ability: at all events, in his earlier compositions, he gives them little work of importance. Even in purely orchestral music (e.g., the Overture to 'Acis and Galatea,' 1721), the viola is sometimes absent from the score. Yet Handel was well able to avail himself of this particular tone-colour when he desired it. In the well-known bass aria 'Revenge, Timotheus cries,' from 'Alexander's Feast,' 1736, the second section 'Behold, a ghastly band,' in which the ghosts of the slain Greeks are depicted, the violins are silent, the score consisting of first and second violas, first and second violoncellos, double-basses, organ, and three bassoons, the latter doubling the violas and first violoncello respectively. The first violas are further occasionally subdivided, playing in octaves. The tenor solo 'Thus long ago,' which occurs later in the ode, is chiefly scored as a trio for two flutes and viola, the latter supplying the bass.

In 'Israel in Egypt' (1738), in the soprano aria 'Thou didst blow,' there is a very important part, chiefly consisting of semiquavers, given to the violas, violoncellos, and bassoons, the former playing sometimes in unison with the bass instruments and sometimes in the octave.

Gluck (1714-1787) frequently writes double-stops for the violas, and divides them when necessary. On the other hand, he often degrades them by making them play in the octave or unison with the violoncellos. There is one striking movement in 'Iphigénie en Tauride,' a solo for Orestes—'Le calme rentre dans mon cœur'—in which the iterated and syncopated notes of the viola (chiefly a dominant pedal) produce a very powerful and characteristic effect.

Haydn did much for the viola. He extended the compass to *g*², or even g^{♯2}, as in the first movement of the great Symphony in C (1791-92). He frequently divides them, as in the Allegretto of the 'Military Symphony.' He occasionally doubles an important violin passage by the violas in the sub-octave, as in the 'Letter T' Symphony (1787). He has anticipated Beethoven by giving the theme to violas, in unison with the violoncellos, in one of the variations in the Andante of the last-named work. In the Minuet of the 86th Symphony, written about 1786, he has for eight bars placed the violas an octave below the violoncellos. But above all, he has raised the viola to a permanent position in the string quartet, and in this post of honour has frequently placed it in special prominence. In the slow movement of the Quartet in E flat, Op. 33, No. 2, the viola is entrusted with the enunciation of the theme, accompanied only by the violoncello. In the third variation of the slow movement of the 'Kaiser' quartet, the two violins and violoncello are the humble servants of the viola. There are two bars in the Finale of the Quartet in G minor, Op. 74, No. 3, in which the viola is heard below the violoncello, with special significance. And many similar instances might be mentioned.

'The Creation,' produced in 1799, contains much important work for the violas. Three special instances may be given. The bass recitative, 'And God created great whales,' is scored for two violas, two violoncellos, cembalo and double-bass, in four- and five-part harmony. In the Trio, 'Most beautiful appear,' a conspicuous rhythmic figure, extending over seven bars, is assigned to the violas and basses, the violins occupying a subordinate position. Again, in the Trio, 'On Thee each living soul awaits,' the entry of the strings is heralded by the violas.

Not all the contemporaries of Haydn followed his example in raising the status of the viola. For instance, Grétry (1741-1811), one of the most successful composers of French opera, generally writes what Berlioz calls 'the fatal col basso.' The violas may for a very few bars enjoy an independent part, or may even be divided, as a crowning effort on the part of the composer, but Grétry very quickly reverts to his favourite 'col basso,' unless, indeed, he doubles the violins with this neglected member of his small orchestra.

Mozart's preference for the viola is well-known. He, unlike Boccherini, includes two violas in every one of his string quartets, and he gives the instrument an extraordinary degree of independence, both in the string quartets and also in the two pianoforte quartets. As a proof of this it is only necessary to refer to the String quartet in E flat (No. 3 of those dedicated to Haydn). Then we have the striking passages for divided violas in the first movement of the G minor Symphony. Among other obligato passages may be mentioned bars 7-14 of the 'Recordare' in the Requiem. The absence of the viola from some of the music composed during the Salzburg period is probably due to the composition of the Archbishop's band. Mention must also be made of the beautiful Trio for pianoforte, clarinet, and viola. If Haydn raised the viola to an equality with the second violin, it is perhaps not too much to say that Mozart makes it third in importance in the string quartet.

The growing importance of the viola was fully maintained by Cherubini, who was particularly fond of writing two viola parts in the orchestral score, as a reference to that of 'Les deux Journées' will show. The theme of the march in the third act of the same opera is announced by violas and violoncellos in unison. Beethoven followed Cherubini as regards the frequent division of the violas. He also made considerably greater use of the double string than any of his predecessors. The occasions upon which he brings the instrument into more or less prominence are innumerable, and mention of a few of them must suffice. In the Septet, written in 1800, the melody is assigned to the viola in the first variation of the fourth movement. In the Finale of the 'Eroica' symphony (1804) there are five bars (repeated) in which the violas, divisi, double the clarinets in the sub-octave. In the C minor Symphony, as every musician knows, one of the loveliest melodies ever penned is given to violas and violoncellos in unison, supported only by a few notes from the double-basses. The second theme of the Finale of the same Symphony is also given to the violas, in unison with the clarinet; and at the return of the 'tempo 1mo' there is a remarkable passage of repeated thirds for the violas, again in unison with the clarinets, the violins being silent. Among the themes announced by the viola, in the string quartets, one recalls the 'Thème russe' in the Allegretto of Op. 59, No. 2; also the Allegro molto of Op. 59, No. 3. In the first movement of the Violin concerto, the second subject is accompanied by thirteen bars of triplets played by the violas, doubled by the violoncellos in the sub-octave. Again, in the second variation of the Allegretto of the 'harp' Quartet, the viola takes the leading part. The theme of the Allegretto of the seventh Symphony (1812) is also assigned to the violas. In the 'Choral Symphony' (1823), the second subject of the slow movement is announced by the second violins, in unison with the violas; and in the presentment of the sublime subject of the Finale, the latter instruments are treated with a consideration which is denied to the former. Finally, at the words 'Ihr stürzt nieder, Millionen,' there are twenty bars of divided violas, each with double string, the violins being silent. With reference to Beethoven's fondness for the double string, it is significant that the viola part in the great fugue for String quartet (Op. 133) is for the final twenty-five bars written in this manner.

The Trio for violin, viola, and violoncello, of which Mozart has left a single example, was an immense advance upon the older Sonata for two violins and bass. Beethoven wrote five, all published before the end of the eighteenth century. Of these, the Serenade in D, Op. 8, may be instanced as showing an extraordinary degree of independence among the three parts: an independence which attained its fullest development in the later String quartets.

The most salient feature in the history of the viola is, of course, the production of Méhul's 'Uthal' in 1806. In this the composer endeavoured to provide an appropriate colouring for the sombre legend of Ossian, by suppressing the violins altogether. It would perhaps be unwise for one who has never heard the opera to express an opinion upon the success of an interesting experiment of a man of genius.

Beyond this point, as regards the prominence given to the viola in orchestral music, there could obviously be no advance. It is of course true that in music of a later date the viola asserts itself much more frequently than in the compositions of the masters mentioned above. In operatic, orchestral, and chamber music, important obbligati are sometimes to be found. Examples are the Trio in F, No. 3, of 'Le petit Chaperon Rouge' (Boieldieu), produced in 1818; the 'Dream' scene of the same opera; certain passages in Hummel's Pianoforte quintet, especially in the Trio, where the viola is carried up to a²; the celebrated Septet of the same composer, in which the viola is the leading string instrument; the long viola obbligato in Aennchen's romance and aria in Weber's 'Der Freischütz' (1821); certain passages in Berlioz's choral symphony, 'Romeo and Juliet' (1839); the recitative and chorus, 'O man of God,' in Mendelssohn's 'Elijah' (1846); the 'Ave Maria' from the same master's 'Lorelei,' in which the violins are silent; the first theme of the Allegro non troppo of Tchaikovsky's Symphony in B minor, which is announced by violas and violoncellos in four-part harmony; and, more important than any of these, Berlioz's symphony 'Harold in Italy,' produced in 1834.

But in the great majority of cases in which a leading part is entrusted to the violas, it will be found that this part is doubled either (1) by the first or second violins in unison or at the octave; (2) by the violoncellos in unison or at the sub-octave; (3) by one or both clarinets in unison or at the octave; (4) or by one or two bassoons in unison. The truth of this statement may be tested by reference to almost any modern score.

Occasionally, variations of the above usual methods of scoring are to be met with. For instance, in the Andante con moto of Mendelssohn's 'Italian Symphony,' the violas are doubled by an oboe in unison, with the bassoons at the sub-octave. The first violas are also in unison with the oboe at the commencement of the 'Scotch Symphony.' In the first movement of Schumann's Pianoforte concerto there is a beautiful passage in which the melody, assigned to flute and pianoforte in unison, is doubled by the violas in the sub-octave. Again, the second subject of Liszt's symphonic poem, 'Les Préludes,' is given to the violas, divided and doubled in unison by the horns. But these arrangements are exceptional, while those mentioned above are the rule. The doubling of the violas by the bassoons, a very favourite practice, seems to have originated with Haydn.

Of classical chamber-music for not more than three instruments, in which the viola takes part, may be named, in addition to the compositions already mentioned:

Haydn.—Trio for violin solo, viola concertante and bass.

Rolla.—Many Duets for violin and viola.

Mozart.—Two Duets for ditto.

Spohr.—Grand Duo for violin and viola (Op. 13).

Schubert.—Two Trios for strings.

Kalliwoda.—Six Nocturnes for viola and pianoforte.

Schumann.—Four pieces for pianoforte and viola (Op. 113).

„ Four pieces for pianoforte, clarinet and viola (Op. 132).

Rubinstein.—Three pieces for pianoforte and viola (Op. 11).

„ Sonata in F minor, ditto (Op. 49).

Dvorák.—Terzetto, two violins and viola (Op. 74).

Alessandro Rolla (1757-1841), mentioned above, for a short time the teacher of Paganini, was an enthusiast for the viola, for which he composed four concertos. His duos, or at any rate several of them, are quite interesting. The nocturnes of Kalliwoda are also well worth playing. In the sixth of these latter the viola ascends to a².

DR. BASIL HARWOOD'S NEW ORGAN CONCERTO.*

Dr. Harwood's Concerto for organ and orchestra was one of the features in the recent Gloucester festival. It is an important work, and deserves special notice. The composer has somewhat departed from the traditional treatment of such works. In place of the continuous contrasting of the solo instrument with the orchestra we have here a work in which both are much more brought together; indeed, save in isolated places, they are seldom heard apart. No doubt there is much to be said for this kind of treatment, and certainly it is done with great mastery by the composer, but one misses the old effects of dialogue and especially the relief and delight one got from hearing the pure diapason tone alone. The work is laid out in three movements. In the initial movement a short, improvisation-like introduction leads to the first subject, which is given out by the orchestra. It is one which calls for considerable freedom rhythmically, and taken with proper elasticity it has much breadth, though perhaps, on the whole, it is in this quality that one finds the work most lacking. After being taken up by the organ and being subjected to some varied treatment, there is a vigorous re-statement of the theme, given out now on the full organ in broader time and with majestic effect. This leads to the second subject in F major, which is of a suave, graceful character. After being introduced by the orchestra it is taken up in a highly ornamented form by the organ. In the development section the two themes are discussed at some length in most interesting fashion. Here, as elsewhere, the passage-writing for the solo instrument is of a masterly character. In the recapitulation, the second subject makes its appearance in the tonic major, the theme being very effectively allotted to the pedals, with brilliant semiquaver passages above it. After a fine crescendo on a dominant pedal, when the theme is given to the orchestra, it reappears with the most impressive effect, being now assigned to full organ and orchestra. This is the real culmination of the movement, and it reveals singular breadth and dignity; after it the short Coda is almost anti-climactic.

The second movement—an Intermezzo—is cast in a chaste and delicate vein, and is admirably suited to show off the quiet stops of the organ. In mood it recalls Elgar, and the idyllic character of the opening bars (deliciously scored for muted strings) is preserved to the end of the movement, which breathes throughout an atmosphere of tranquillity and tenderness.

In the last movement the Rondo form is used, to which a certain freedom is imparted by episodes of a recitative-like character for organ and orchestra. In these the composer makes much use of certain solo stops of the modern organ, notably the clarinet and orchestral oboe. When the actual instruments are at hand in the orchestra, it seems scarcely justifiable to use what must be at best but poor imitations of the real thing, and when performed with orchestra it will probably be found expedient to play these passages upon stops exemplifying pure organ tone. The scoring in these episodes is of a particularly happy kind, some charming effects of an entirely new character being obtained from the celesta. At first sight it seemed curious to include this instrument in the score of a work of this character, but the result shows that Dr. Harwood had admirably calculated his effect, for, in combination with the organ, it gives very much the idea of an extension of the tone-colour of the Willis Liebluchs, 8 and 4. A striking feature of the movement is the introduction of a fugato section founded upon the principal theme of the first movement. Here great demands are made upon the pedal technique of the player, as is also the case in the cadenza, which presents the only instance of a pedal glissando known to the writer. The cadenza itself is a brilliant fantasia upon material heard in previous parts of the work, and, though short, is extremely effective. A final presentation of the first theme of the work, given out with the full weight of organ and orchestra, leads to a Coda (Presto) characterized by some brilliant passage-writing, with which the work ends.

Though thematically the work has not quite the distinction we are accustomed to expect from Dr. Harwood, the way in which the themes are handled is exceedingly interesting; the orchestration, too, is very modern in character, and, moreover, the composer knows how to work up to great masses of sound, and how to secure dignified and imposing effects. The concerto calls for a fine technique, and it is such a work as the modern organist will revel in getting up. Like Handel's overtures as issued by Walsh, it will be found 'very apt for the improvement of the hand'—and, one may add, the foot.

MODERN ORGANS AND ORGAN MUSIC.

BY FREDERICK KITCHENER.

That the organ is the 'king of instruments' is an assertion which the average British music-lover accepts without question. If this assertion was true when first made, many years ago (the organ at that time being a comparatively clumsy and unmanageable instrument, to play upon which involved no small amount of sheer animal strength and physical endurance), how much more true it is in these days of orchestral stops, pneumatic action, and labour-saving contrivances! Given the most perfect of stops, no player could possibly give much pleasure to his hearers while the actual effort of performance caused him great discomfort, if not positive pain. What a vast amount of mental energy is expended by enthusiastic protagonists upon the question of the improvement of the modern organ! That a considerable number of persons, competent no doubt, and thoroughly understanding the subject argued upon, should differ greatly in their individual ideas concerning what does and what does not constitute a genuine innovative improvement in organ construction, is in itself a healthy sign of the importance generally attached to the matter. While allowing for and admiring the high pitch of excellence in organ-building already attained to, those of us who are young may confidently expect that changes, no less far-reaching and wonderful than those contemplated or carried into execution during the last few years in other branches of human activity, will take place in both the mechanical and artistic designs of the organ of the future.

Every musician knows what an immense advance in the style of pianoforte composition was caused by the extension of the keyboard of the instrument. It is no exaggeration to say that a revolution in Beethoven's pianoforte conceptions was largely the result of the greatly increased opportunities of self-expression which this mechanical extension afforded him. Comparing the pianoforte with the organ, no one will deny that the improvements made in the construction of the former during Beethoven's lifetime were relatively of infinitely less significance than those which have been made in the construction of the latter during the last fifty years. It cannot be maintained, however, that a corresponding advance in the style of composition for the organ has been made. Max Reger is thought by many to be the leading composer of organ music now living. It is said that 'Back to Bach' is his musical motto; but the idea of such retrogression is paradoxical, as a mere glance at Reger's works shows us that he has written many progressions that Bach never would have written, in spite of the unfounded and easily disproved assertion of some that Bach forestalled everything possible of accomplishment in modern music. Again, in composing many of his works, Reger seems to have ignored the possibilities of modern registration and the registrative powers of present-day organists. It may be argued on his behalf that Bach did the same; but we must remember that the organ for which Bach wrote was very different from the complex, subtle and expressive organ representative of to-day. In many modern German works for the organ, not only of Reger but also of other composers, it seems that the music was first composed without any thought whatever of the registration; that the piece was then gone through and a few directions for manual-change thrown in haphazard. Indeed, the manuals are often directed to be changed in places where changes prove to be totally ineffective in actual performance; or the directions 'crescendo' or 'diminuendo' are given in passages where it would be impossible for these effects to be obtained, the hands and feet being fully occupied in playing the written notes. Passages obviously intended for performance upon one manual are also, as an afterthought, divided and given to two manuals, the result being awkward and ineffective.

Without wishing unduly to exalt our own nation, we may take to ourselves the credit of having some of the finest organists in the world, whose playing calls forth universal admiration. Is it strange that these artists are obliged, when searching for compositions that shall display the modern organ to its best advantage, to furnish their répertoires largely with transcriptions of orchestral compositions by Wagner, Tchaikovsky, and other non-organistic composers? While not going as far as some well-known musicians, who intensely dislike all 'arrangements' for the organ, we can easily see that it is not possible for these latter, from their very nature, to be as effective as would be strong, interesting, original music composed specially for the organ—music that would thoroughly employ the resources of the modern instrument, while thoroughly representative of its essential dignity.

Some there are who say, 'We have the music of Bach; this surely contains all that is necessary for organists for all time.' While acknowledging the unparalleled genius of Bach, none of us would like, for instance, to be entirely confined to the 'Wohltemperirte Klavier' for our pianoforte music; there is plenty of room for Beethoven, Chopin, Schumann and Liszt; and this applies with equal force to the question of organ music. Others assert that Mendelssohn and Rheinberger have supplied all that can possibly be needed; but, fine as the works of these composers are, they represent a past stage in organ construction and a past period in organ composition.

Then comes the vexed question as to what form is best suited to be the vehicle of modern ideas and modern technique in this department. Can anyone declare that an organ recital, the programme of which is made up chiefly of classical works, is as popular among average people as one the programme of which contains a majority of lighter pieces? And it is the average person whom most of us have to attract and to depend upon for support. Are modern organ fugues, such as those of Reger—close in texture, monotonous in tone-quality, and obscure in melodic outline—likely to appeal to the great majority of persons who attend organ recitals? The writer has known of cases, and those among persons whose musical tastes were certainly above the general average, in which not only unmitigated boredom but also intense headache has been caused by listening to the performance of heavy latter-day German organ pieces in fugal style.

Certainly the fugue, played for the most part upon a single manual, was the best form for organ composition in times when to change stops was a matter of difficulty; but in these days of light manual and pedal action, as well as of opportunities for easy stop-manipulation, some form or forms (other than fugue) affording greater scope for the use of orchestral solo-stops, subtle tone-contrasts between combinations of stops on different manuals or between the high-lights and solid low tones of the instrument, chord or arpeggio passages, pedal solos with manual accompaniment, and other perfectly legitimate and artistic devices, would be found more satisfactory, both from the view-point of the executant and of the auditor, for the more complete representations of the modern musical spirit in its highest manifestations than the somewhat crabbed, restricted, sombre, hackneyed fugue, or fugal forms.

Let us suppose that a music-loving Londoner, who has frequent opportunities of hearing the finest orchestras in the country, has gone of his own free will, or has been enticed, to an organ recital at which arrangements of the 'Siegfried Idyll' and a movement from the 'Symphonie Pathétique' figure as items in the programme. He knows that the finest organist in the world, playing 'arrangements' of such works as these upon the finest organ in the world, can only succeed in making his performance a caricature—magnificently done, perhaps, but still a caricature—of the composer's intentions. He feels only too keenly that the best organ stop imitative of the violin can only produce tones that are, when compared with the strains of the original, but as water unto wine. He inevitably draws comparisons, and makes up his mind that when he wants to hear orchestral music he prefers to hear it played by an orchestra.

It might happen that our music-lover finds himself one day at an organ recital given by an organist who has rigid ideas of the fitness of things, and eschews 'arrangements.' Then our friend is treated to a programme, forbidding in its severity, of entirely classical works. Or the organist may be eclectic, and given to pride himself upon the catholicity of his taste; in this case our Londoner, long-suffering man, is regaled with a musical hotch-potch, classical masterpieces being mixed up, regardless of suitable juxtaposition, with pieces of the light French school and arrangements of popular songs. Still worse, he may have been dragged, willy-nilly, to a recital of the sensational type; he may have been treated to imaginary thunder, lightning and rain, the crowing of the barnyard fowl, the shrill twittering of birds, and other such delectable noises. What sane manager of orchestral concerts would ever expect to attract audiences by drawing up programmes of works utterly unsuitable for performance by the orchestra, or by a selection of pieces drawn exclusively from the severest classical school? In the case of a single concert, such proceedings might conceivably be attended by success, but certainly not in the case of a number or a series of concerts. Yet many organists wonder why their recitals, after a certain time, fail to maintain their hold upon the public favour.

Notwithstanding the enormous advances made of late years both in organ construction and in the technique of organ-playing, it is to be feared that until composers for the instrument recognise these advances in a practical manner by writing music for the modern organ, and until organists exercise more judgment in the selection of items for their recital programmes, neither the instrument itself nor the executants upon it will receive that augmented share of public recognition and appreciation which the grandeur and comprehensiveness of the modern organ deserves and the great ability possessed by many artistic performers upon it justifies their looking for.

'THE NEW CATHEDRAL PSALTER' AND 'THE NEW CATHEDRAL PSALTER CHANTS.'

The issue of these important works by Messrs. Novello has afforded an opportunity for criticism, of which full advantage has already been taken. The very mention of the word 'Psalter' seems to rouse the indignation of many who have long wanted a chance of unburdening themselves. Many of the criticisms offered are at least amusing, and the diversity of opinion expressed only goes to show that some people will not be satisfied. One writer actually thinks that 'if the old melodious (sic) chants are to be thrust aside by modern musicians as antiquated, we have no doubt that Anglican chanting will decay altogether, especially in view of the vigorous manner in which plainsong is being advocated.' Indeed! Then we have not advanced during the last twenty or thirty years? But when a man uses the expression 'union of simplicity with sound melody,' we have no hope for him, and he surely is not capable of forming an opinion worthy of the admirable series (not yet complete) before us. We have let ourselves go over this point, as it is an example of the extraordinary narrowness of view held by many, however well-meaning their criticism. But we gladly note a very general appreciation of the great work which has undoubtedly been accomplished by the distinguished editors of both text and music. Such names as appear on the title-pages (The Archbishop of York, Canon Scott Holland, Sir George Martin, Dr. C. H. Lloyd and Mr. Charles Macpherson, are surely a guarantee of high excellence. The publishers, too, must be congratulated upon the admirable execution of their work. The printing of both text and music offers all that can be desired in clearness and spacing, while the binding is substantial and attractive in appearance. Three different methods of pointing have been adopted, viz., by means of superimposed notes, by prosody signs, and by varied type. Surely one or other of these will satisfy the most exacting. We agree with many who prefer the varied type as encouraging more elasticity in the result. The note-value system we feel to be too rigid, while the prosody signs are more difficult to scan, and must, we should imagine, be more troublesome to instil into the mind of young choristers. But the admirably clear preface in each case might well cover any objections. In turning to the music, we note with gladness the disappearance of many monotonous single chants. There is too little scope in seven bars for anything like satisfactory construction. The double chant has always appealed to us as the most satisfactory solution of a difficult problem. It is just long enough to prevent monotony, and not too long for the changing expression of the words. Many new chants have been written for each collection, some of which attain high merit, while a fair proportion of old favourites has been retained, though it is not of course possible to please all in this matter. We conclude by affirming that if this attempt fail to secure a good interpretation of the meaning of these glorious songs of the Church, we shall look to any other system, be it even plainsong (so much belauded and over-rated) with little hope or prospect of lasting usefulness.

THE MUSIC-TEACHERS' ASSOCIATION.

The aims and treatment of the teaching of music to all grades of students are just now passing through some interesting phases. The development is most noticeable in connection with pianoforte teaching in secondary schools. Many thoughtful musical educationists have revolted against conventional methods which, moving in a dreary rut, have sought to reach the mind through the fingers, instead of reaching the fingers through the mind. So we are now provided with methods based on psychological observation; on appeals primarily to inborn faculties and vital forces behind nerve and muscle. It is not that the new crusade claims that its methods are discoveries.

MR. STEWART MACPHERSON.

They are frankly eclectic, and concentrate whatever is found suitable to the end in view. The leading feature of the plans adopted is the importance attached to ear and mind training. In the elementary stages the pupils are taught to observe and resolve into musical notation the elements of tonal and rhythmic relations, and their appreciation of music is trained by exemplifications of the art which are performed and explained to them. The pupil's appreciation is therefore not dependent on the results of his own clumsy efforts. It is obviously a considerable advantage that both of these appeals can be made to classes large and small. For the purpose of focussing the efforts of the advocates of these rational methods of teaching, and of spreading their use, the Music-teachers' Association was formed in 1908. It owes its existence to the untiring efforts and ability of Mr. Stewart Macpherson, who is the chairman of the committee. The motto 'No examinations' is inscribed on the banner of the Music-teachers' Association which claims that its operations are more likely to help than to rival other educational institutions. The following are its stated objects:

(i.) To promote progressive ideas upon the teaching of music, especially with a view to the more educative treatment of the subject in schools.

(ii.) To press upon heads of schools, and to stimulate and maintain amongst teachers, a recognition of the important and often overlooked fact that music is a literature, and should be taught and studied from that point of view.

(iii.) To insist most strongly—as a preparation for this 'art of listening'—upon the necessity of systematic ear-training from early childhood.

(iv.) To promote class-singing, in which singing at sight shall be the chief aim, as an invaluable means of ear-training and of the cultivation of rhythmic and melodic perception.

(v.) To realise that the amount of time at the disposal of the average boy or girl for the overcoming of the technical difficulties of an instrument is, in the nature of things, usually insufficient to make them even passable executants, and therefore that it would be a wise thing to devote a certain amount of time to bringing the pupils into living touch with music itself, by means of carefully graded classes, in which the teacher should play to the pupils, giving them a simple and intelligent description of the form and character of the music, asking questions from time to time, in order to ascertain how much has been grasped by the class.

THE TRAINING OF THE TEACHER.

(vi.) Encouragement of more definite and systematic preparation for the art of music-teaching, by means of courses of lectures by specialists on such subjects as ear-training, form or design in music, musical history, and other matters relating to the teaching of music.

(vii.) The Association puts forward, as the objects which those training to be teachers should have in view, the following:

(a) To maintain for oneself and foster in others an interest in the more rational study and teaching of music.

(b) To lose no opportunity of gaining information and enlightenment on this subject.

(c) To remember that the instrumental lessons that most musical students are taking are only one part of their equipment as teachers. Ear-training, harmony as its logical successor, form, history and other kindred subjects are indispensable to that equipment.

(d) To arrange their hours of study in such a way that the whole of the time shall not be devoted merely to the technique of an instrument.

The president is Sir Alexander Mackenzie, and many other well-known musicians have shown their confidence in the aims of the Association by joining the committee. Meetings have been held in London and various parts of the country, and Aberdeen, Brighton and Bexhill are among the towns at which local branches of the Association have already been formed. In all these branches, as in London, the membership of the Association has grown rapidly and in the most encouraging manner.

No one will dispute the statement that Mr. Macpherson is at present the chief force of the Association. He has advocated the claims of rational music-training with much ability and eloquence, both in speech and in print. His book, 'Music and its appreciation,'* and the pamphlet, 'The appreciative aspect of music study,'* should be widely read in pedagogic circles. They reveal a systematic mind and keen educational insight.

Church and Organ Music.

It is often said of organ music of the present day that it fails to employ the resources of the modern instrument, and that the efforts of composers turn naturally towards the production of fugues or works of similar severe construction. In other words, it is urged that the development of the organ has outstripped the music written for it. As regards pieces intended for use in church, this criticism may no doubt be fair, and any tendency to widen the scope of such music should be carefully watched, though we do not claim that anything approaching finality in this respect has yet been reached. There is certainly ample room for progress, but it must proceed upon intellectual lines, relegating all that is emotional, and be in keeping with the traditions of the church which has for so long made use of the organ as an aid to its services. This will no doubt occasion the pitying smile of the many who see no harm in contaminating the sacred associations of the House of God with such a work (glorious as it certainly is as an example of emotional music) as the 'Liebestod' of Wagner, by way of a concluding voluntary. We go further, and even doubt whether such music ought ever to be heard in church, even at an organ recital. This brings us to our point, which is that the excuse pleaded by numbers of organists, that so little has been written for the organ which gives lasting pleasure to the multitude, will very soon no longer be valid. No doubt the extraordinary advance in the production of tone-variety and means of stop-manipulation has made the organist of to-day restless and discontented with the meagre opportunities the older organ music offers for the display of these characteristics, and in despair he turns to secular music to provide the means of expression which is too often mistaken for artistic merit. But we say with confidence that a school of composition is rapidly developing in our midst which must before long succeed in placing the organ in the undoubtedly high position it deserves, and freeing it from the stigma under which it has laboured so ineffectually. We have before us some examples of organ music by living composers who evidently appreciate the crux to which we have referred. The name of Sigfrid Karg-Elert is becoming known in this country in connection with works embodying inventive and exuberant fancy with a recognition of the tonal and mechanical possibilities of our modern instruments. His 'Three impressions' (Harmonies du soir, Clair de lune, and La nuit) will be found to possess a fascination for those who will trouble to unravel their difficulties of notation, which now and then are considerable. A feature of modern music consists, we feel, in allowing the beauty of a harmonic progression to speak for itself, without relation to its actual part in the construction of the piece. This is illustrated by such a passage as:

The following, too, is justified by its effect, though it possesses undoubted possibilities as an examination 'poser':

We propose to give, in our next number, a detailed notice of the same composer's important work: 'Chaconne and Fugue Trilogy.'

Karg-Elert has further enriched the organist's repertoire with a series of 'Choral preludes,' the harmonic structure of which is surprising in its wealth of idea and masterly development. This form of organ-music, from its consummate treatment by J. S. Bach to its further cultivation by Brahms and Max Reger and the composer under discussion, is evidently permeating the thoughts of many to-day, and examples may be found in the programmes of organ recitals in an ever-widening circle.

But our native composers are equally well to the front in writing music which is certainly not 'of the baser sort.' The name of Sir Charles Stanford will occur to many as synonymous with all that is lofty in aim, and true and subtle in construction. We look to him for many and varied examples of his art. Though an amateur, Mr. A. M. Goodhart, of Eton, has produced works which only make us regret his choice of a profession. His Impromptu in G flat is charming and certainly ingenious. It is labelled 'a study on a cipher,' and the recalcitrant note for once gives a charm by reason of the varied harmonies and figures with which it interweaves. A recently published piece (Study in 7-4 time) is an excellent example of the composer's sense of refinement. The piece concludes with the following passage, affording a simultaneous use of the three manuals with double pedal:

A new organ has been erected in the Parish Church, Wimborne-St.-Giles, Dorset, by Messrs. Harrison & Harrison, at the cost of The Earl of Shaftesbury. At the opening recital given by Mr. Francis Burgess, on September 1, his Lordship, who is the possessor of a fine tenor voice, contributed to the programme two solos from the 'Messiah.'

The new organ at St. Devenick's Church, Bieldside, N.B., was opened on August 24, when Mr. T. W. North, organist of Dudley Parish Church and Borough organist of Walsall, gave two recitals, at 3 and 8 p.m. The programmes were excellently arranged and very skilfully rendered, while they showed most successfully the capabilities of the organ. The instrument is the work of Messrs. Wadsworth & Brother, of Manchester and Aberdeen, while the oak case is from the hands of Mr. D. K. Graham, of Aberdeen.

Messrs. Cramer, of 126, Oxford Street, have taken over the sole agency for Great Britain of the celebrated Mason & Hamlin American organs.

THE ORGAN IN DONCASTER PARISH CHURCH.

We have received an account of the opening of the above organ, which has been in the hands of Messrs. Norman & Beard, and we hope to give an extended notice of this in our November issue.

SPECIAL SERVICES.

The monthly musical service at the Parish Church, Portsmouth, which was given on Sunday, September 4, included 'The wilderness' (Sir John Goss) and 'Ascribe unto the Lord' (John Travers). The Trio in the former was well rendered by Messrs. Woodford, Wassell and Guard. Mr. Turner, the organist of the church, played the organ, his solos including J. S. Bach's Prelude and Fugue in C and Sterndale Bennett's Barcarolle in F.

The Wesley Centenary will be commemorated during the week of the Leeds festival at the daily evensong at the Leeds Parish Church, where Wesley was organist from 1842 to 1849. The anthems will include the two great eight-part anthems, 'O Lord, Thou art my God' and 'Let us lift up our heart,' also 'Wash me thoroughly,' 'Cast me not away,' 'Ascribe unto the Lord,' 'Praise the Lord, O my soul,' and the Service in E, written at Leeds for the Leeds Parish Church. The daily choir will be specially augmented from the Sunday choir.

ORCHESTRAL MUSIC.

Fantasia-Variations on a Swedish Air. By William V. Hurlstone.

Dross. By Paul Corder.

[Novello & Co., Ltd.: Avison Edition.]

Hurlstone has never become widely known as a writer for the orchestra owing to the paucity of his efforts in this direction and not to their lack of merit, as is made abundantly clear both by the work under consideration and by the 'Magic mirror' suite, whose production at the Promenade Concerts is noticed in another column. The appellation 'Fantasia-Variations' is significant of the freedom of treatment adopted by the composer in this work. The subject-matter is not so much a pedestal to a statue as a life-giving vein to living flesh, visible here and there. It is plainly traceable in the first few variations, but is then lost to view while the composer is concerned with elaborating his own accompaniments and incidental ideas. Later it again becomes recognisable as snatches of it are brought into prominence, sometimes with vehemence and sometimes with delicate fancy. The statement of the simple and ingenuous theme is preceded by a weighty introduction, which foreshadows much of the independent material of the later movements. The high faculties of the composer, well-known through the medium of his chamber music, did not abandon him when he penned this composition. His resources are handled with mastery: the effect is there not for effect's sake, and, as usual, romance and beauty capture the senses while a characteristic academic flavour earns our esteem.

Mr. Paul Corder's 'Dross' is cast in a novel form, being a continuous commentary upon the action and dialogue of a one-act stage play. The plot, unfolded by four principal and two minor characters, is a grim tragedy of destitution, pride, dishonour and treachery, the scene of which is laid in France not long prior to the Revolution. Its progress gives plentiful scope for dramatic illustration, contrast of mood, and characterization in the accompanying music, and Mr. Corder has seized his opportunities. His idiom and harmonies are up-to-date without being ultra-modern, and his work is full of vitality and interest in spite of its necessary sombreness.

Eight Organ Choral Preludes (Bach). Transcribed for the pianoforte by A. M. Henderson.

[Bayley & Ferguson.]

Any method by which the knowledge of these masterpieces is cultivated deserves wide recognition, and we welcome Mr. Henderson's arrangements as a perfectly legitimate means to that end. There are, necessarily, some awkward points for small hands, but the music is worth any trouble it may give, and we hope there may be other examples which will lend themselves to adaptation.

A Book of Thirty Hymn-tunes. By Mrs. Henry Flyuder.

[Weekes & Co.]

Though there will always be some difficulty in severing the connection of favourite hymns from their accustomed tunes, we think there are several tunes in this collection which might worthily displace some we know of. Another recommendation is that all profits arising from the sale of the book will be divided between the Queen's Jubilee Nurses and the Victoria Hospital for Children, while last, but far from least, the work is dedicated, by gracious permission, to Her Majesty Queen Alexandra.

A Kalender of Hymns Ancient and Modern for 1911. By the Rev. Robert Sealy Genge.

[London: Henry Frowde.]

This will be found indispensable to those responsible for the choice of hymns, which is not always a simple matter. Much thought has been bestowed by the compiler, and we foresee a wide adoption of his suggestions which are generally excellent.

CHORAL MUSIC.

Harvest Cantata. By Julius Harrison.

[Novello & Co., Ltd.]

This new work is composed for soprano (or tenor) and contralto (or baritone) soli and chorus, to words written by Rose Dafforne Betjemann, and is dedicated to that lady's husband, Mr. Gilbert H. Betjemann, the well-known violinist. Mrs. Betjemann's words are partly quoted from scripture, and are otherwise original. As befits the theme, they breathe a spirit of joy and thankfulness, and their imagery is such that anyone can understand. There are six numbers, two of which are solos, one for solo and chorus, and three for chorus only. Mr. Julius Harrison made himself famous by his setting of 'Cleopatra,' which was performed at a Norwich festival. All who saw or heard that elaborate and difficult work will be pleasantly surprised to find that in his setting of this Harvest cantata the composer has adopted a very simple style without anywhere degenerating into commonplace. Any well-equipped village choir could cope with the choruses, and the two solos are quite within the powers of amateur singers. Yet the music will always interest the cultivated musician. Mr. Harrison has a quite original style. There are many points of harmony, melody, and rhythmic treatment that prove this. The expression of the words is generally conspicuously appropriate. The solo, 'The winter reigneth o'er all the land,' has perhaps the fault of its prettiness and rhythmic lightness. The other solo (for contralto or baritone), 'He filleth the hungry,' is a smooth cantabile that cannot fail to please. In the last chorus there is some imaginative writing that culminates effectively in a joyous climax to the ever-useful words 'Hallelujah, Amen.' The accompaniment is written for the organ and presents no special difficulty. The cantata takes about a quarter of an hour to perform.

DR. ARNE'S RELIGION.

TO THE EDITOR OF 'THE MUSICAL TIMES.'

DEAR SIR,—In reply to Mr. Barclay Squire's letter, I beg to say that the details I gave as to Arne dying a Catholic—as he lived—are from notes (apparently by Rev. John Kirk) in a copy of Butler's 'Historical Memoirs,' formerly belonging to Sedgley Park. I copied them some twenty years ago at St. Wilfrid's, Oakamoor (Cotton Hall). My interest was mainly due to the fact that the notes stated Arne to have been 'Organist of the Sardinian Chapel, in Lincoln's Inn Fields,' under Bishop O'Brullaghan (Bradley), an Irish Dominican friar, who was chaplain to the Embassy from about the year 1730 till his death in May, 1760, except for twelve months when he was Bishop of Derry. Therefore Arne was probably organist from 1756 to 1763 or 1764.

As to the inhuman and barbarous Penal Laws against Catholics in the mid-eighteenth century, I refer Mr. Squire to Monsignor Ward's 'Dawn of the Catholic Revival in England' (vol. i., pp. 2-4). Arne, as a Catholic, would have to enrol the deed assigning any little value—no matter how small; an expensive and perplexing obligation.

In conclusion, I am happy to have been instrumental in rescuing much biographical data relating to Arne; and it afforded me considerable pleasure to have been of some little assistance to the late Mr. F. G. Edwards in his sketch of Arne for the Musical Times, November and December, 1901. My latest researches regarding Arne's visits to Ireland will be found in the July issue of the Musical Antiquary.

Yours faithfully,

September 14, 1910.

THE TEMPO OF 'O REST IN THE LORD.'

TO THE EDITOR OF 'THE MUSICAL TIMES.'

SIR,—At important performances of the 'Elijah' for some years past there seems to have been a divergence of opinion in regard to the tempo of the air 'O rest in the Lord.' The reminiscences of an old-stager like myself may, or may not, help to settle the matter.

When Mendelssohn brought out the 'Elijah,' at Birmingham, I was a chorister at Trinity and St. John's Colleges, Cambridge, under Professor T. A. Walmisley. He knew Mendelssohn, and went to hear the oratorio; with him went Mr. John Sutton (afterwards Sir John), a wealthy Fellow-Commoner of Jesus College, and three of our senior boys, Fred Smith, Robert Humm, and James Piper (I mention their names, as I think that two of them are still living). They were all delighted with the 'Elijah,' and as soon as the vocal score and parts were published we had them at our practice-room at Trinity and worked at them daily. I well remember that before we sang 'He that shall endure,' Dr. Walmisley beckoned me to the pianoforte, saying, 'Here, Dan, boy, sing this' (I could always read), and forthwith we went through 'O rest in the Lord.' Years after I heard Miss Dolby sing it many times, with exactly the same swing that Walmisley had taught it to me. Later on I heard my old friend James Coward play it at one of his organ recitals at the Crystal Palace. It was encored, and he played it again, and each time at the same tempo that Miss Dolby had sung it.

There must be very many people who can remember Sainton-Dolby's rendering of her part in the 'Elijah.' She was a true artist, and always to be relied upon, and in my opinion she never sang it so fast as ♩ = 72. Mendelssohn may have intended that as an indication of the mean time, scarcely, I think, as a march time (i.e., in strict time). It has been sung and played as an excerpt so many times that it began in consequence to be drawled. On the other hand, when the whole oratorio is performed, it is simply No. 31, but it must not be forgotten that the words touch some of the tenderest chords of the human heart, and so require very delicate treatment. I think that ♩ = 60 would be nearer the real time.

Yours faithfully,

DAN WILBERFORCE ROTHAM,
Conductor, Bristol Madrigal Society.

ORGAN AND ORCHESTRA.

TO THE EDITOR OF 'THE MUSICAL TIMES.'

SIR,—Mr. Lemare's article on 'The organ as an artistic instrument' must prove in the main instructive and enjoyable reading to all lovers of the king of instruments. There will be many, too, who will endorse his opinion that the study of orchestral music by the advanced player 'will create a striving for the perhaps unattainable, as far as the organ is concerned.' Surely the organ is one thing and the orchestra something totally different. The orchestral writer committing his ideas to paper is not looking through the spectacles of the organist: his is a very different conception, both as regards tone-colour and the scope, variety and compass of his instruments with their peculiar technique. It is the age of the specialist, and for the organ and orchestra to encroach one upon the domain of the other is to leave an unsatisfactory impression upon the ears of an ever-increasing musical public who can appreciate the difference between the two; for here again, to quote Mr. Lemare, 'instead of copying another man's, he (the organist) will paint his own picture. He will be not merely receptive, but creative.' Yes, quite so; and many when listening, even those most capable of doing so, have the feeling that it is very much his own picture, and his own creation. The organ is a king in its own province, and it need not become a rival where it will come off second best. Music of the orchestral style, of which there is such a fine répertoire available, is within its own sphere, and appeals to the serious musician with force and energy, which can hardly be the case when listening to revised editions of heavily-scored orchestral works upon even the best of organs.—Faithfully yours,

Chattisham, Ipswich.

ORGAN PROGRAMME.

TO THE EDITOR OF 'THE MUSICAL TIMES.'

SIR,—I read Mr. Luther L. Jupp's letter with a pleasure that was enhanced by the courteous tone he adopted and by the sincerity the revealing of his identity betokened. I do not think, however, that any good would come of a discussion. He accepts without reservation the conventionalities I wrote against, and then argues from them as proven and established premises. He will perhaps pardon my saying that he has missed the whole line of my argument and (incidentally) the main feature of musical evolution since the middle Beethoven, proof of this lying in such sentences as 'supposing the movements of the great symphonies and sonatas of Beethoven were constructed on the "unity" as against the "contrast" principle, would they be so enjoyable?' It is evident that unity in a work of art is not the same to Mr. Jupp as it is to me. I think he will read my article in a different light when he realises that the unity striven for is one of fundamental idea or prevailing spirit, as in the Elgar Symphony or in the first famous example—the C minor Symphony of Beethoven. No amount of change from Scherzo to Adagio can effect a break in an extended musical utterance when the composer is struggling to thresh out all that the emotional idea holds for him; and in the same way the unity of a concert programme made up of small items should be preserved. But all this leads over the ground already covered in my essay, and there is no need to continue it.

I am, yours faithfully,

I, Alcester Road,
Moseley, Birmingham.
